PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 4, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we ask for grace that we may see the problems of life from Thy point of view. May not all our measures and weights be material and physical, but may they be spiritual. May we understand the spiritual import of all the facts of life. Amid the drudgery of our daily task, do Thou shed forth Thy light, that we may see the smallest thing in its divine import and understand that Thou, who dost note the fall of a sparrow, dost take note as well of all performance of duty on the part of Thy children. Guide us this day. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, on Friday, April 30, the RECORD shows that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated:

From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back with certain amendments the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting, on conditions, the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 568) thereon.

Whereupon the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said:

Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, with the consent of the Senate, I shall address myself to the joint resolution just reported by the Senator from Massachusetts.

In view of the notice given by the Senator from Pennsylvania that he would address the Senate to-morrow upon this very important measure, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD House joint resolution 327 concerning this matter, together with the majority and minority reports of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs thereon, and also the report which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] submitted on behalf of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Report No. 568, with the substitute proposed by the Senate committee in lieu of the House joint resolution. I make this request in order that Senators and the public may have an opportunity to read the same before the address of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

House joint resolution 327.

Joint resolution terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States; permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Whereas the President of the United States, in the performance of his constitutional duty to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, has advised the Congress that the war with the Imperial German Government has ended:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 2. That in the interpretation of any provision relating to the date of the termination of the present war or of the present or existing emergency in any acts of Congress, joint resolutions, or proclamations of the President containing provisions contingent upon the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, the date when this resolution becomes effective shall be construed and treated as the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, notwithstanding any provision in any act of Congress or joint resolution providing any other mode of determining the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency.

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals, and for this purpose, it is hereby provided that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned and thereupon and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification, commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits, and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the inhabitants of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall willfully violate the foregoing prohibition whenever the same shall be in force shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both, and any property, funds, securities, papers, or other articles or documents, or any vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, concerned in such violation, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a waiver by the United States of any rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war, or otherwise; and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

[House Report No. 801, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.]

TERMINATION OF STATE OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. PORTER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report. [To accompany H. J. Res. 327.]

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred House joint resolution 327, having carefully considered the same, reports it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The authorities on international law agree that there are three ways of terminating war between belligerent States: First, by a treaty of peace; second, by the conquest and subjugation of one of the belligerents by the other; third, by the mere cessation of hostilities so long continued that it is evident that there is no intention of resuming them.

War may be terminated in three different ways: Belligerents may (1) abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty, or (2) belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty of peace, or (3) a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary. (Oppenheim, International Law, vol. 2, p. 322.)

There are three ways of terminating hostilities between States, namely, (1) by a mere cessation of hostilities of both sides, without any definite understanding supervening; (2) by the conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other so that the former is reduced to impotence and submission; (3) by a mutual arrangement embodied in a treaty of peace whether the honors of war be equal or unequal.

Under the first mode the relationship between the parties remain in a condition of uncertainty, and, owing to the numerous difficulties involved, combatant States have very seldom resorted to this method of withdrawing from the war without arriving at some definite and intelligible decision. (Phillipson, Termination of War and Treaties of Peace, p. 3.)

It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, July 22, 1868, Dip. Cor., 1868, vol. 2, pp. 32 to 34, cited Moore's International Law, vol. 7, p. 336.)

The armistice was signed November 11, 1918, nearly 17 months ago, and while a treaty of peace between the Imperial German Government and the United States was signed at Versailles on June 28, 1919, it has not been ratified by the Senate of the United States, but, on the contrary, it has been returned to the President after an adverse vote upon the question of its ratification. The usual and normal method of terminating the war status having thus failed of accomplishment, it becomes the plain duty of Congress to declare the admitted fact that the war is ended.

There has been a complete suspension of hostilities on both sides without any intention of resuming them. Congress is clearly exercising powers which are within its constitutional rights in recognizing and declaring that the condition described by the writers on international law which are above quoted has now arrived, and that the war is at an end. As, by the resolution of April 6, 1917, Congress officially recognized the fact that war had been thrust upon us, so now it becomes the duty of Congress to give official recognition to the fact that the war is ended. Moreover, the general welfare of the United States imperatively demands that all uncertainty upon this subject shall cease, and that the extraordinary war powers of the Government shall be vacated and set aside.

The laws conferring extraordinary powers upon the President for the duration of the war are still in full force and effect and constitutional rights are still suspended. Many of these laws are extremely drastic and could be justified only as war necessities; but since the war has, in fact, long since ceased the justification for these laws no longer exists.

Some of the war laws were to be operative only during the war; some were to continue for certain periods after the war in order to give an opportunity to adjust and wind up business undertaken under war powers and not completed when the war ended; others were to continue in effect for limited periods and various purposes. Each of these laws fixes as the date of the termination of the war the date of the President's proclamation announcing the ratification of the treaty of peace. Section 2 of this resolution proposes in lieu of the date of the President's proclamation the date when this resolution becomes effective as the date of the termination of the war.

The effect of this resolution on all of the war legislation will be precisely the effect that the ratification and proclamation of the treaty would have had. Laws that were to be in force for the period of the war would have ceased with the President's proclamation; under this resolution they will cease with the date of its passage. On the other hand, laws that were to continue in effect for a time after the ratification and proclamation of the treaty of peace will continue in effect for the specified time after the passage of this resolution. The resolution, therefore, has no effect upon existing laws other than the effect that the ratification and proclamation of the treaty would have had.

Section 3 provides for the resumption of reciprocal trade relations between Germany and the United States for a period of 45 days and further provides that such reciprocal trade relations shall be permanently established when the President has ascertained and announced that Germany has declared a termination of the war and has made the waivers and renouncements on behalf of itself and its nationals which are specified in said section. The placing of these conditions on the permanent resumption of trade with Germany is a reasonable exercise of the power vested in Congress by the Constitution "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." In making certain legislation contingent on a fact to be ascertained and announced by the President, this paragraph follows precedents established in previous acts of Congress and especially section 3 of the act of October 1, 1890—the McKinley tariff act—which was sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., p. 649).

Section 4 provides a penalty for violation of section 3 whenever the prohibition provided by that section shall be in force.

Section 5 maintains the rights to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice or by reason of its participation in the war or otherwise, and ratifies, confirms, and maintains all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States on account of the war.

[House Report 801, part 2, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.]

TERMINATION OF STATE OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. FLOOD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following minority views to accompany H. J. Res. 327:

1. The purpose of this resolution is to terminate the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government; in other words, to declare peace.

2. To fix the date of the termination of the war or the present existing emergency.

3. To make a treaty of peace with the German Government.

4. An attempt to preserve something out of the wreck of American rights which this resolution destroys.

The preamble states that the President of the United States, in the performance of his constitutional duty to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, has advised Congress that the war with the Imperial German Government has ended.

At no time and under no circumstances has the President made any such assertion. It is true that on the signing of the armistice the President, in the course of an address to Congress, used the words, "the war thus comes to an end." But he spoke of actual hostilities, as everyone knew, and not of the technical state of the war. He meant that active hostilities had ceased. It takes a treaty to end a war. (Higo v. United States, 149 U. S., 315.) Hostilities had ceased, but the war had not ended, and will not end until it is terminated in a constitutional manner. The drafters of the resolution and the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs who voted for it knew that this was the case. Indeed, after the President's address on the 11th day of November, 1918, a commission went abroad for the purpose of negotiating a treaty and bringing about a condition of peace. Several months were occupied in negotiation, and the treaty that resulted was, in due and proper course, submitted to the Senate of the United States, and was the subject of discussion there at various times for nine months.

By quoting this statement of the President as the basis for this resolution, the authors of the resolution lay themselves open to the charge of insincerity and sharp practice. The President never declared that the technical state of the war, which this resolution undertakes to declare at an end, had come to an end, and the Supreme Court of the United States has recently declared that what the President had done did not announce the legal determination of the war. (Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Companies, U. S. Sup. Ct. Opinion, Dec. 15, 1919.)

The whereas of this resolution is therefore a misrepresentation which will mislead but few.

GENERAL STATEMENT.

This resolution contains some provisions that are within the power of Congress, and others that are not. So far as it seeks to declare peace, and so far as it seeks to direct the President to issue a proclamation to the German Government, it trenches upon the treaty-making powers, and is not within the power of Congress.

So far as it prohibits United States citizens and residents from commercial intercourse with Germany or its nationals and provides penalties for the violation of such restriction, it is valid. So far as it attempts to repeal war legislation it is, of course, within the power of Congress.

SECTION 1.

The first section of the resolution resolves that the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States by a joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end. This is a plain attempt to declare peace by a joint resolution. This Congress has not the power to do.

The Constitution vests in Congress the power to declare war. (Const. U. S., Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 11.) There is no suggestion of the power to make peace being vested in Congress.

The power to declare war or to make peace is not a legislative power, and unless otherwise expressed in the constitution of a country, is a branch of the treaty-making power, and a grant of the power to make treaties necessarily gives to the officials so empowered the exclusive right to make peace.

The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the government itself and of that of the States. (Geofrey v. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258, 267.)

The method of making peace is by treaty. Therefore, when the treaty-making power was conferred on the President and Senate, the power to make peace was conferred on them.

The Supreme Court cites with approval the following:

Within these limits (immaterial here) all questions which may arise between us and foreign powers, be the subject matter what it may, fall within the treaty-making power, and may be adjusted by it. (Trent on Constitution and Government of the United States (Calhoun), 204.) (Howenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S., 483, 490.)

There being no power to make or declare peace expressly vested by the Constitution in Congress, in order to exercise it Congress must show: (1) That it is a legislative power, and by implication arises. (2) That it is not vested in any other department.

1. The making or declaring peace is essentially not a legislative power. Legislation can not operate on a foreign country. It is essentially an executive, diplomatic function.

2. By the grant of the treaty-making power to the President and Senate, it is expressly vested elsewhere, which excludes Congress as its repository.

That this power is not legislative and that Congress has no share in it is demonstrated by the proceedings of the convention framing the Constitution. The first proposals would have placed the power to declare war and make peace with the Senate. (Madison Papers (5 Elliot), 131.)

It was then proposed for the "legislature" to "make war" and the "Senate" "treaties." (Ib., p. 379.)

Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature the power of peace, as they were to have that of war.

Mr. Gerry seconds him, etc.

On the motion for "and peace," after "war," it was unanimously negatived. (Madison Papers (5 Elliot), p. 439.)

When the power to make treaties finally came up, it was vested in the President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. A motion to add "House of Representatives" was defeated. (Ib., 523.)

At first a difference was made between treaties of peace and other treaties, requiring a less vote for a peace treaty. (Ib., 525.)

On reconsideration, this difference was stricken and treaties put on same basis with all treaties. (Ib., 525–527.)

It was finally determined, because of the necessity for flexibility of negotiation, to confer the power on the President, joining the Senate for reasons as stated by the Federalist, as follows:

The qualities elsewhere detailed as indispensable in the management of foreign negotiation point out the Executive as the most fit agent in those transactions, while the vast importance of the trust and the operation of treaties as laws plead strongly for the participation of the whole or a portion of the legislative body in the office of making them. (Federalist, No. 75.)

Vattel, in his Law of Nations, speaking of the power to make peace, while stating that the general rule is that the same power that has the right to make war likewise has the right to make and conclude peace, states:

A nation that has the free disposal of her domestic affairs and of the form of her government may intrust a single person or an assembly with the power of making peace, although she has not given them that of making war.

And cites as an example Sweden, where—

The King can not declare war without the consent of the States assembled in Diet, but he may make peace in conjunction with the Senate. (See Vattel's Law of Nations, pp. 432, 433.)

The works on international law by American authors give the following as the powers of declaring war and making peace under the American Constitution:

The American Constitution vests the power of declaring war in the two Houses of Congress with the assent of the President. By the forms of the Constitution the President has the exclusive power of making treaties of peace, which, when ratified, become the supreme law of the land and have the effect of repealing the declaration of war and all other laws of Congress and of the several States which stand in the way of their stipulations. But Congress may at any time compel the President to make peace by refusing the means of carrying on the war. (Wheaton, International Law, sec. 538.)

The power to make treaties of peace is usually the same as that to make any other treaties. In the United States it is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. (Maxey on International Law, pp. 521–522.)

The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized that the termination of war and making peace belongs to the treaty-making power, and not to the legislative body.

In a foreign war a treaty of peace would be the evidence of the time when it closed. (United States v. Anderson, 9 Wall., 56, 70.)

Speaking of the War with Spain, the court said:

A state of war did not in law cease until the ratification in April, 1899, of the treaty of peace. (Hijo v. United States, 194 U. S., 315, 323.)

While it is doubtless true that precedents can be found of where Congress has, the President assenting by approval, undertaken to pass resolutions affecting foreign relations, it is generally recognized that these are but expressions of opinion.

SECTION 2.

Section 2 fixes the date of the termination of the war as the date when this resolution shall become effective in all matters relating to war and emergency legislation.

There is much war and emergency legislation that should be repealed. This section does not repeal this legislation, however, and it gives no relief from the burdens, inconveniences, extravagances, and losses which come from the existence of this legislation. Much of this legislation is burdensome and oppressive in time of peace. Congress has the power to repeal it, and it should address itself to this task instead of frittering away its time in attempting to pass unconstitutional legislation for the purpose of embarrassing the executive department of the Government or for some other political purpose.

A list of this legislation shows that if this resolution became a law, some of this legislation would remain on the statute books for five years. This list demonstrates the importance of Congress getting industriously to work to repeal or modify these measures in an orderly and scientific manner, as the country has been demanding that it do for nearly a year. The following is a list of this legislation:

After a war has ended—that is, after hostilities have ceased—intercourse may be resumed with the enemy in a more or less restricted manner or intercourse may be resumed freely and without restriction. But it is obvious that this relation may be a temporary expedient pending the conclusion of an agreement with the enemy, and that it does not in itself settle any of the questions in dispute between the belligerents which caused the war or which arose out of the war. If "peace" is merely the return to normal conditions, as nearly as possible, of trade and intercourse between enemies, then peace can be established by each of the belligerents lifting its war-time restrictions. But such de facto peaceful relations can not be entered into by one belligerent alone taking this step without the concurrent action of the other in taking a similar step. While one country may abolish its restrictions on intercourse, the other country may maintain them. It is, therefore, necessary that some identical or similar action be taken by the two belligerents before peaceful trade relations can be established—in essence, an agreement expressed either by concurrent legislation in both belligerent countries or by a signed instrument. Should, therefore, the Congress of the United States remove from the statute books the emergency legislation which allows the Executive to prevent or restrict trade and all forms of intercourse with the enemy, and should the enemy take action to bring about similar results, de facto peaceful intercourse would be reestablished without the intervention of a treaty of peace.

But the establishment of peaceful intercourse does not settle pending controversies with the enemy, such as indemnity for war losses, and innumerable other matters unsettled by war. It is submitted that such matters can only be settled by agreement negotiated or imposed. This is one of the main functions of a treaty of peace. Although there are no decisions squarely in point, so far as has been found in the short time at our disposal, there are dicta to the effect that a war in which the United States is engaged can only be concluded by a treaty of peace. (Ware v. Hilton, 3 Dallas, 236; U. S. v. Hicks, 256 Fed., 710; 22 Atty. Gen. Op., 190.) Moreover, it is a fact that every war in which the United States has been engaged has been concluded by a treaty of peace, except the War between the States, which was an internal conflict. The protocol of August 12, 1898, with Spain (sometimes erroneously called a modus vivendi) was held by the Attorney General not to terminate the Spanish-American War. (22 Op. Atty. Gen., 190.) It was really in effect an armistice suspending hostilities pending the negotiation of an agreement upon certain bases laid down.

While, therefore, peaceful trade relations may be reestablished by legislative action concurred in by the enemy power, the disputes of the war could not be settled thereby or until some sort of agreement has been negotiated between this country and Germany.

SECTION 3.

This section, in substance, provides that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States, and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned, and thereupon and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification, commercial intercourse, etc., except with the license of the President, shall be prohibited.

The first thought which comes to one's mind in connection with this section is that it gives to Germany and her nationals all the rights they would have had if the United States had ratified the treaty of Versailles. This we will deal with later.

Another thought is that the resolution not only attempts to declare the war at an end but it attempts to make, in effect, a treaty with Germany, because the section quoted contemplates affirmative action upon the part of Germany in accepting the terms laid down in the resolution. This is an indirect way of attempting to establish contractual relations between the two Governments—an agreement which, taken in connection with the rest of the resolution, amounts to a treaty—and constitutes, therefore, a bold invasion of the treaty-making powers, which are the constitutional prerogative of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. (U. S. Const., Art. II, sec. 2.)

An examination either of congressional debates, or of executive documents, or of the decisions of the Supreme Court, from the beginning of the Government, will show the great care with which each of these departments has endeavored not to infringe upon the province of the others.

The three branches of the Government have acted upon the theory that if any given power belongs to one branch of the Government, presumptively it does not belong to the other branch.

ACTS CONCERNING FOREIGN RELATIONS, EXECUTIVE IN THEIR NATURE, AS SHOWN BY HISTORY—ENGLISH PRACTICE.

That in Great Britain, the principal constitutional government of Europe when our Constitution was adopted, the making of treaties and all matters affecting her relations with foreign countries were prerogative—that is, executive—appears from Todd (Parl. Gov., vol. 1, p. 369.) Until of late years treaties were not laid before Parliament until after ratification (p. 367), and the initiation of a foreign policy not taking the form of a treaty belongs to the Executive exclusively (p. 369).

It is in the light of this conception of the executive character of foreign negotiations and acts concerning foreign relations that our Constitution gave the President power to send and receive ministers and agents to or from any country he sees fit, and when he sees fit, and not to send or receive any, as he may think best. Also the power to make treaties—that is, to negotiate with or without agents—as he may prefer, when he may prefer, or not at all, if he prefer; to draw up such articles as may suit him, and to ratify the acts of his plenipotentiaries, instructed by him, the only qualification of his power being the advice and consent of the States in the Senate to the treaty he makes.

These grants confirm the executive character of the proceedings and indicate an intent to give all the power to the President which the Federal Government itself was to possess—the general control of foreign relations.

In Great Britain, Parliament can refuse to pass laws to carry out treaties when ratified and binding between the nations. What Parliament can and habitually does do passes into a constitutional precedent. But powers wrested by Parliament from the Crown stand upon a different footing from powers granted in our written Constitution. They partake more of the character of mere might than of functions created to be exercised to given ends. Parliament can do what it has the ability to compel the Crown to submit to; but Congress and the President are not the result of struggles between hostile forces. While, therefore, Congress can refuse to appropriate to carry a treaty into effect, since no one can compel it to do so, and the President can refuse to carry on a war authorized by Congress, or to execute any law passed by Congress, yet such proceedings are not constitutional and could never become constitutional by habit, for our Constitution is written, and each part of the Government represents the will of the whole Nation in preventing another part from exercising its functions to the fullest extent.

The President, in making a treaty, is the United States, and speaks the whole mind of the United States. For this very reason it was deemed advisable to safeguard what he does by the advice and consent of the special representatives of the sovereign States in the Senate, since treaties are the most important and binding acts concerning foreign relations, except making war. The solemn power of authorizing war is for the same reason made an exception. But not even the Senate is concerned with the matter of negotiating or preparing treaties; and all that great body of international business which may lead up to treaties or even to war, which the refusal to receive a minister might occasion, is given to the Executive by the express grants concerning treaties and ministers.

That this is a great power is true, but it is a power which all great governments should have, and, being executive in the conception of the founders, and even from its very nature incapable of practical exercise by deliberative assemblies, was given to the President.

The judicial branch of the Government has set a proper example of respect for the other branches in declining to inquire into foreign affairs even for the purpose of deciding cases. Congress should follow this example, which is but a recognition of the principle that each branch, in its proper functions, is the ultimate sovereignty of the United States—the sole and final spokesman of the will of the Nation.

Otherwise the principle of mere might will be introduced, and each branch proceed to do or omit whatever the other branches have not means to effectually prevent, which will be the end of government of and by the people and the beginning of an usurped government over the people. Written constitutions being, like all human contrivances, imperfect, will then have been proven impracticable. (Senate document.)

It is clear all through the Constitution, and it has never been disputed, that the intention was to distribute the powers of the Government among its three branches, subject to such checks as the veto of the President or the advice and consent of the Senate, and not to place any given power in two or three branches of the Government concurrently.

Section 3 of the resolution is an attempt to obtain the benefit of the protection of the treaty of Versailles which the Senate did not see fit to ratify, but a careful consideration of the subject will point out the danger that this attempt might lead us into. It is astonishing that the Congress of the United States should seriously consider the proposition that our country should seek the protection of a treaty which it has not the courage to ratify. In this attempt it may cause untold embarrassment and great loss to America.

1. Ships: The treaty and arrangements ancillary thereto deal in a precise and definite way with enemy shipping. Without these provisions, great uncertainty prevails as to the title to and right to use of German ships. The title of the United States to German ships which it seized during the war is very doubtful, as the ships have never been put through a prize court, and these ships now come under the jurisdiction of the reparation commission. Until title is confirmed in the United States, uncertainty, with attendant danger to American interests, must remain.

2. Alien Property Custodian funds: These funds, approximately $500,000,000, can not be dealt with otherwise than by restoration to the owners unless German consent to their application to other purposes is obtained through a treaty. This resolution does not pretend to accomplish this result. International law does not permit the confiscation of private property unless the enemy government consents to the use of such property for the satisfaction of claims against it or like purposes. The Versailles treaty contains Germany's assent to the use of Alien Property Custodian funds to pay claims of the United States and its nationals against Germany and debts of Germany to America. In the interest of justice, as well as of business, it is urgent that these questions be settled. Many of America's Lusitania victims and victims of other German outrages have for years been kept waiting for the redress to which they are plainly entitled. The adoption of this resolution would postpone that redress indefinitely.

3. Producers of staples in the United States: This resolution does nothing whereby trade with Germany in wheat, cotton, tobacco, and other farm products can be revived; on the contrary, it proposes under certain conditions to prohibit commercial intercourse with Germany altogether. Under a blanket license we are carrying on trade with Germany, but relatively it is small in amount, and no large transactions can be entered into until credit arrangements are made. This resolution does nothing to aid this situation, but it proposes, if the German Government does not agree to its hard terms, to punish our people by prohibiting them from trading with the German people. In the present situation of the world's trade we will be the sufferers.

Suppose Germany declines the terms proposed. We are at peace with her, under the provisions of section 1, and yet by section 3 we place an embargo on all trade from our nationals with her. The cotton producer, who finds Germany the only great market for low-grade cotton, must sell his cotton to England at sacrifice prices and allow her to resell to Germany at a profit. Our export tobacco would lose the German market. Likewise the machinery manufacturers, the flour millers, the packing houses, and all the great producers and distributors of wealth would be denied the German market by the embargo directed by this resolution except on license from the President. Under what law will he grant license? There is no provision in this resolution for so doing.

4. Again, the United States has an immediate interest in the proceedings of the reparation commission provided for by the treaty, and which is in no way taken care of by this resolution. This commission has control over the payment by Germany of the cost of the armies of occupation, including our own. If we are dependent for our status of peace upon this resolution, we fail to see how we could be able to demand reimbursement for the cost of our armies of occupation.

5. We have called attention to the fact that this resolution gives to Germany and her nationals all of the rights they would have had if the United States had ratified the treaty of Versailles. Under this treaty Germany can become a member of the League of Nations, and having under this resolution all the rights it would have had under the treaty when it became a member of the League of Nations, it would be entitled to assert against the United States the same rights which any other nation would have been entitled to assert against this Government had our country ratified the treaty. We would thus be in the position of being compelled to protect the independence and territorial integrity of Germany against the aggressions of any or all of our former allies. We would be bound to carry out article 10 of the League of Nations with reference to Germany if this rsolution became law and Germany accepted the provisions of it. We would thus be extending to Germany a protection and rights which the leadership of the Senate have so violently proclaimed that we would never extend to any nation on the face of the earth. We have refused to enter into any such obligations with our allies, and yet by this resolution we propose to give the benefits of those obligations to Germany.

SECTION 4.

Section 4 simply provides for a penalty for violations of other provisions of the resolution.

SECTION 5.

This section is an attempt to preserve something out of the wreck of American rights which have been so outrageously surrendered in former sections of the resolution. A disclaimer was introduced that our country does not waive its rights under the armistice, and it further provides a ratification of the previous war acts of our country in the matter of fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States.

Manifestly, such a declaration adds no legal force to the statutes already created. Neither section 3 nor section 5 renounces the old Prussian treaty. From whatever angle this resolution is viewed it presents itself as a proposition not only ineffective in achieving its proclaimed purpose, but as a sure method of confusing our foreign relations, injecting new and complicated questions into an already difficult situation, and involving a surrender of American rights and an impairment of American prestige and honor.

This section in no sense preserves the material benefits we would have gained in protection of American interests by representation on the reparation commission. For example, the interests of this country in the final disposition of certain tankers owned by a German corporation, which, however, is controlled by the Standard Oil Co., can be best preserved by sitting officially on the commission which may decide the matter. The continued participation of the United States in the benefit of certain options contained in the treaty, particularly with regard to dyes and pharmaceuticals, will depend upon the action and consent of the commission. Furthermore, the attributing of German assets and reparation payments to the satisfaction of the expenses of the American army of occupation; the approval of payment by German municipalities to American owners of municipal bonds; the participation of this Government in the distribution of German cables; the proper protection of the assets and business of American life insurance companies in Austria and Germany; the satisfaction of relief credits extended to Austria, and decisions as to what food and raw materials supplied to Germany may be credited against the initial 20,000,000,000 mark payment—all these matters of importance, the satisfactory outcome of which may rest upon whether or not by participation in its functions we will exert an influence on the policies of the commission and make use of our ability to prevent decisions unfavorable to our interest. Clearly our most effective protection against unfavorable decisions lies in official representation and the exercise, should occasion arise, of the veto right exercisable by us under the treaty, on questions involving the power or jurisdiction of the reparation commission. The framers of this resolution seem not to have considered this situation.

This commission, by the terms of the other treaties modeled after the German treaty, will probably extend its powers over the assets of the other enemy countries, including Turkey. The commission is authorized to construe the provisions of the treaty which define its powers and jurisdiction, as has been mentioned above. Recent reports show a desire to extend these powers by broad construction. If, for instance, it is decided, as has been suggested, that the commission, under article 235, has direct or indirect power to affect generally privately owned property in Germany or assets and credits possessed by German nationals in foreign countries, an opportunity would be offered to the Governments dominating the reparation commission indirectly to exercise a controlling influence on private trade with Germany or other enemy countries, perhaps to threaten thereby American commerce. With this possibility in mind we must realize that by the terms of the treaty of Versailles the influence and power of a large part of the world is concentrated behind the decisions of the reparation commission, and what amounts practically to a right of veto exercisable by the United States in matters involving decisions on the powers of the reparation commission can be exercised for our protection only if and when we obtain official representation on the commission under the terms of the treaty.

Hostilities with Germany long ago ceased; trade with Germany is going forward under licenses issued by the Government under presidential proclamation; nothing remains except to make a technical peace; and there is but one way in which this can be accomplished with safety to the interest of this country and its nationals in the circumstances, and that is through the constitutional methods provided by our form of Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate a letter which I have received from quite a number of injured soldiers who are taking vocational training at the State College of Agriculture in Georgia. It is short and I would be glad to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

ATHENS, GA., April 30, 1920.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We the undersigned come to you in a personal appeal for what we think is our rights. In regard to the bill that passed Congress recently, allowing the married men taking vocational rehabilitation training a raise of $5 per month and the single men a raise of $20 per month, we feel that we have not had a square deal, so we appeal to you.

In the first place, Senator, we were living on the very least that a people could live on in order that we might get the education that we need so badly. Then, again, the United States Government and its officials fixed the pay and allowances that our dependent families would receive while we were in the Army. And for the single men to get a raise of $20 and the married men a raise of $5, do you think it would be fair? We can't answer for you, but we say no.

Mr. Smith, don't understand us to say that the single men are not in need of the raise; they are, and more than they are getting. So are we married men.

Again, Senator, reason teaches us that one person can live on $100 per month far more comfortably than two can on $120. With this increase bill Congress has just stepped in and taken $15 each month that our wives and children need so much.

Mr. Smith, if we were able-bodied men we would not ask this of you, but we are not. A great many of us are minus of arms and legs, and there is no indication of new ones growing on, so we feel that we have done our part as well as the other fellow and we ask that we be compensated accordingly.

We could go on and tell you a great many more reasons why we should get this raise equalized, but we don't think it necessary, for we feel that you will not let our wives and children suffer when there is no just cause for it.

If you should care to reply to this appeal, address your correspondence to L. J. Highsmith, 174 Hickory Street, Athens, Ga.

With best wishes, we remain,

THE REHABILITATION VOCATIONAL MARRIED MEN'S CLUB OF THE GEORGIA STATE COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE, Athens, Ga.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have been absent from the Senate for two or three weeks, but I hardly think the situation can be such as is stated in the letter which has just been read from the desk. I feel that there must be some mistake about the suggested changes in legislation described in this letter, but I have presented the letter to the Senate, for I do not believe we have given that careful study to the condition of the injured ex-service men which we should have given. I am not particularly troubled about those who came home perfectly sound. I desire that the letter may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which, as I understand, has control of the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. The Finance Committee has the matter under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Utah informs me that the Committee on Finance has the matter under consideration, and I should therefore be glad to have the letter referred to that committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator from Georgia will yield to me for just a moment, I think I can make some explanation of the present situation. The Committee on Education and Labor this morning made a report upon House bill 12266, which increases the compensation of both single and married ex-service men by $20 per month. That bill was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor to-day by the chairman [Mr. KENYON], the committee having this morning, by unanimous decision, ordered the bill to be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Mexico that the bill to which he refers has been reported this morning and is on the calendar.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I believe that bill will cover the point made by the letter which has been presented by the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will lie on the table, the bill having been reported to-day.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4323) to enforce the provisions of the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to elective franchise; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THOMAS:

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice which I gave yesterday, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions without amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should be glad to hear the Senator from Indiana explain this bill.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I think the bill explains itself. I have no desire to address the Senate concerning it at this time, although I may do so later in case debate ensues concerning it which appears to develop any real occasion for me to speak.

The bill provides for a system of pensions to the veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer expedition. It is 22 years since the Spanish-American War was fought, and this is the first pension legislation that has been proposed for the benefit of the survivors of that war. As I have said, I do not think I care to say anything concerning the merits of the bill at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. KING. This bill, as I understand its provisions, commits the Government of the United States to a policy of pensioning those who have been in the military or naval service, whether or not they receive injuries or incur disabilities.

Mr. NEW. I think, Mr. President, that this bill commits the Government to no policy to which it is not already committed.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator state that it is the policy of the United States to pension every person who has been in the naval or military service of the Government, no matter how brief the period, whether injured or not, whether suffering from any disabilities incurred in the line of service or directly or indirectly traceable to any service in behalf of the Government? I understand that this bill goes that far.

Mr. NEW. This bill does not go that far. The bill says that the persons described in it shall be—entitled to receive a pension, not exceeding $30 per month and not less than $12 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support; and in determining such inability each and every infirmity shall be duly considered and the aggregate of the disabilities shown be rated.

It is practically the same as the general pension law of 1890.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, it does provide pensions for all persons who were in the Army or the Navy during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition for 90 days or more, whether they were in battle or not, whether they remained in the United States or not, whether they were exposed to any danger or not, and whether they received any injury or not. The bill goes further and grants pensions to all such persons, though they are in perfect health or are rich and prosperous. It also pensions all who may now or hereafter suffer from any disability not the result of their own vicious habits, whether it was caused by such service or not, or whether or not it can be traced directly or remotely to such service. Is that not true?

Mr. NEW. If they are suffering from any mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will excuse me, they do not have to prove that the disabilities, mental or physical, from which they are suffering are traceable to their service in the Army.

Mr. NEW. Not any more than they do under the pension law of 1890—in the same way.

Mr. KING. The pension law of 1890 relating to the Civil War veterans?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator placing those who served in the Spanish-American War on the same basis as those who served in the Civil War?

Mr. NEW. Oh, no, Mr. President; I am not instituting any comparisons whatever between American soldiers of any two wars. The man who has worn the uniform of his country and followed the flag in one war is as much entitled to consideration as the man who has followed it in another. He has gone into the military service of his country without any preknowledge of where that service was to take him, or how extensive it was to be, or anything of the kind. The soldier of the Spanish-American War was a volunteer soldier, and went in to do his duty by his country as he saw it, and he did it, and he did it surprisingly well, too. The soldier of the Spanish-American War has nothing whatever but praise and affection for the soldier of every other war in which the United States has ever engaged, and he is not setting himself up at all to be compared with the soldier of any other period, and nobody is making any extravagant claims for him, and nobody feels that he is called upon to make any apologies for him, either.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. KING. A moment ago the Senator used the expression that the Spanish-American War veteran was a volunteer soldier. Does this bill limit the pensions to be paid to the volunteers, or does it extend them to all who served in the Regular Army during the Spanish-American War?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, there are certain facts to be considered in connection with the Spanish-American War which, I think, would be somewhat surprising to all of us if we only stopped to recall them. They are things that are perfectly well known to us, but have probably passed from our recollections in the 22 years that have elapsed since that war was fought.

It is a fact that when war was declared between the United States and Spain the Regular Army of the United States consisted of less than 25,000 men. The soldiers of the Spanish-American War were almost all volunteers in the strict acceptance of the term; and, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] very correctly states, the Regular was a Volunteer soldier, too. They were all volunteers. There was no draft. The Regular Army, as I say, consisted of a few more than 24,000 men, and the call was for 250,000 volunteers. It was responded to with a promptness that does infinite credit to the patriotism of the American youth of that day, just as the response to every other call for volunteers has done credit to the American youth of every other day in which one was ever made. The Senator from Utah asks if I propose to compare the soldiers of the Spanish-American War with the soldiers of the Civil War. I say no; I am not comparing them with the soldiers of any other war. We are simply standing here saying that they were all soldiers, and they are all entitled to equal treatment at the hands of their Government, so far as the treatment of the soldier is concerned. I want to say to the Senator from Utah——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. NEW. If the Senator will permit me just to conclude this sentence, as a matter of fact the records of The Adjutant General's Office and the Surgeon General's Office show two things that I think will surprise the Senator from Utah a little, if his attention has not already been directed to them. One is that in the first five months of the Spanish-American War there were more volunteers, more men in the service of the Government, than there were in the first five months of the Civil War, and the fatalities of the first five months of the Spanish-American War actually exceeded the fatalities of the first five months of the Civil War. I am not instituting any comparisons, no; but it is not at all amiss to state facts, and those are facts as shown by the official records of those two bureaus of the War Department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not suggest, nor did I intend to institute a comparison between the Civil War veterans and those who entered the Army at the time of the war with Spain. I merely inquired whether the Senator sought to place those in the service of the United States during the Spanish-American War upon the same basis as those who were in the Civil War.

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. KING. Perhaps I did not express my meaning clearly. What I had in mind was to inquire whether it is the purpose of the bill to employ the same standard as a basis for pensions for all persons who were in the Civil War and the Spanish-American War. Of course, I would not suggest a comparison between the valor of the Civil War veterans and the valor of those who participated in the Spanish-American War. All did their duty, and the American soldier in every war has done his duty, and in any future war he will live up to the high standards established by the heroic conduct of those who have offered themselves in defense of the honor of our country.

If the Senator from Indiana has concluded, I ask that the report be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Assistant Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. NEW on April 16, 1920, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expendition, having considered the same, report favorably thereon within the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The report of the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives hereto appended is adopted, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

[House Report No. 132, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, beg leave to report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

This bill follows largely the act of June 27, 1890, which was the first legislation enacted by Congress for the relief of Civil War soldiers suffering from disabilities not contracted in the military service. The provisions of that act are virtually unchanged except as to the rates of pension allowed. The act of 1890 provided a maximum of $12 and a minimum of $6 per month. This bill proposes a maximum of $30 and a minimum of $12. The committee feels warranted in recommending these advances, believing that the largely increased cost of living is sufficient justification for its action. Many of these veterans, who freely volunteered their services in response to their country's call, are living in abject poverty and distress. Lower rates of pension would be inadequate to afford proper relief.

The committee submits herewith a memorandum from the Bureau of Pensions, giving an estimate of its probable cost:

"JULY 16, 1919.

"Probable cost of the bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition for the first three years, should it become a law, as ascertained by comparison with results of the first three years under the act of June 27, 1890: The bill follows the invalid provision of said act, except that the maximum and minimum rates are $30 and $12 per month as against $12 and $6 per month under the act, which would make the cost of the bill per pensioner somewhat more than double.

"The number of men engaged in the War with Spain, etc., was about one-seventh the number engaged in the Civil War, the estimated numbers being 312,000 and 2,213,365, respectively.

"The results for the first three years under the act of June 27, 1890, in numbers of invalids on the roll at the close of the years and the totals paid each year, are as follows:

	Number of pensioners.	Total paid.
1891	101,112	$7,812,107.65
1892	293,068	43,845,071.02
1893	377,203	54,568,610.16

"Taking one-seventh of the number of pensioners and two-sevenths of the amount paid in each year as approximating the cost of the bill in the first three years after enactment, the results are as follows:

	Number of pensioners.	Total paid.
First year	14,445	$2,232,030.76
Second year	41,867	12,527,163.14
Third year	53,886	15,591,031.48

The burden of providing many of these indigent, disabled veterans with the necessities of life has to a great extent rested upon their former comrades and the Spanish War organizations to which they belong. The committee believes that the existence of such conditions should not longer be permitted, and that it is the duty of a just and generous Government to make suitable provisions for those who have been its defenders in times of stress and danger.

These men served in Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and in the insanitary camps within our borders. They contracted malaria, fevers, and many of the diseases prevalent in tropical countries. Thousands of them, unable to trace their disabilities to their service, after a lapse of more than 20 years, are receiving no pension, and under existing laws can never be pensioned. They have waited patiently, and now, after a lapse of more than 20 years, have appealed to Congress for a small measure of relief.

The act of June 27, 1890, in its application to Federal soldiers, was by reason of existing conditions largely sectional. But the benefits of this bill would be extended in equitable proportion to Spanish War soldiers in every State of the Union. There was no sectionalism in response to the call of President McKinley in 1898 for volunteers. Each State did its full duty and sent its full quota. The readiness of every section to meet the situation demonstrated that the Nation was reunited in spirit and purpose. The sons of the North and the South alike took up arms in defense of their common country.

The committee feels that discussion of the merits of the pension system is not necessary. The country has been committed to it virtually throughout its history. The care of those who have borne the brunt of the battle has been and is regarded as a sacred obligation of the Republic. To the extension of this just protection to the disabled veterans embraced in this bill the committee is of one mind, and unanimously recommends it to the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I realize that nothing which can be said in this body or in the other branch of the National Legislature will prevent the passage of this bill or any other pension bill that may be offered. The country seems to be pension mad, and Congress is similarly affected.

Can it be that the approach of a national election has any relation to the demand for immediate pension legislation?

The political air is full of pension qualities. I am not so sanguine that back among the sober and serious persons, who are the real power in this Nation, there is that insistent demand for pensions and bounties and gratuities that we are led to believe is sweeping over the land. I know, however, that there are those who are urging that the Federal Government grant pensions to all persons over a given age, whether they have been in the military or naval service of the United States or not.

The same schools teach that pensions should be granted by the United States to all persons who are in any way disabled or who are unable to earn a livelihood. These individuals utterly fail to comprehend the nature of the Federal Government or the limitations placed upon it. They point to monarchical Governments of Europe and urge that inasmuch as civil and old-age pensions are paid by some the United States should follow that example. I am not discussing the propriety or impropriety of granting pensions of this character by the various States in the United States. Unless they are restricted by State constitutional limitations they have the right and power to adopt this policy. I am only considering the question from the standpoint of the power of the Federal Government. It is obvious that the States have the power to do many things which the Federal Government could not do.

There is a growing hysteria, which finds an outlet in wild and visionary schemes, calling for governmental control over private affairs; a paternalistic regulation of individuals and States; a submergence of the States in the Federal Government; and an all-persuasive collectivism which is destructive of the virile qualities and Anglo-Saxon characteristics which have made the people of the States of this Union the most progressive and self-reliant people upon the earth and this Republic the most powerful instrument for liberty and freedom that the world has ever produced.

Mr. President, there must be no decadence in the moral qualities which influence and guide the American people. There must be no flabby and flaccid political organism; the strenuous life now more than ever is essential to the development and preservation of the high qualities for which this Nation stands.

We want no anemic virtues. We need rugged and sterling national and individual traits now as never before. I have sometimes thought, when encountering the influences which seek to effeminate the American people and lead them to believe that they must rely upon the Government for life and health and being, that we needed a strong blast from the bugle of Theodore Roosevelt or Andrew Jackson.

We should be awakened to the fact that all power is in the people, not in the Government; that when the people surrender that power and transfer it to a Government, no matter its name, the freedom of the people will be lost and a tyrannous external authority will be created.

Mr. President, these observations may not be germane to the pending measure, and yet the persistent talk of pensions and governmental aid and control inevitably develop the situation which I have imperfectly glimpsed and suggested.

Mr. President, it would seem from the statements of the Senator from Indiana that the Government has entered upon a policy of "service" pensions. Under this plan, as I understand the Senator, all persons are to be pensioned who at any time entered the military or naval service of the United States.

The Senator, of course, did not state the proposition quite so nakedly as I have put it, but his position logically must lead to that end.

Recently we passed what is known as the Fuller bill, that gave $50 per month to all persons who were in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War. In order to obtain this pension the beneficiary need not have seen a battle or been within a thousand miles of a battle field. He need not have been wounded and he need not be in poor health. He may be rich and prosperous, and yet he draws a pension from the Government of $50 per month. It is a service pension.

The pending measure is framed along the same lines.

Moreover, the Fuller bill granted pensions to widows far removed, who may have been married and divorced a score of times. It also extends to parents and alleged dependents whose relationship is not very intimate.

Of course, we will be called upon soon to amend this bill and increase the pensions and extend its provisions to the relatives of those who are provided for in the bill.

Referring to the Fuller bill, it was urged, Mr. President, that because of the high cost of living the Government should increase the pensions which heretofore had been granted to those who were in the military or naval service of the Government during the Civil War; and, pursuant to that representation, notwithstanding a pension bill was passed not long ago upon representations made that no further appeal to Congress would be made, a bill was passed increasing the amount, as stated, to $50 per month. Of course, that bill did not supersede pensions which were granted by specific bills, which aggregated thousands and tens of thousands, and in many instances the pensions provided by special bills exceed the amount provided in the so-called Fuller bill.

It may be, Mr. President, that we are committed to a policy of pensioning everybody who has responded to the call of his country whenever we have been engaged in any wars with other nations. I shall regret if that is the policy of this Republic. I shall regret if we announce it to be the permanent policy of this Government to pension everybody who has enlisted in the Army or in the Navy, and who has served but a few days or a few weeks, and has suffered no disability, has not been wounded, has been in no battle, has participated in no conflict.

I am not able to take the view expressed by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], and which apparently seems to be the view of the overwhelming majority of the Senate and of Congress, namely, that everybody must receive a pension if he enlists or is drafted for a few days' service in the Army or in the Navy.

I do believe in liberal pensions for those who served their country upon the deep or upon the field of battle, and who received wounds and injuries or suffered disabilities which impair their health or make it impossible or more difficult for them to engage in the pursuits and avocations of life. The Government should be liberal in caring for the wounded, for the sick, for the disabled, for those who while in the military or naval service of their country were in any manner injured or thereafter suffered from any disability which can be traced to such service. And the widows and orphans of those who gave their lives for their country should be generously provided for.

Mr. President, I believe in liberal and generous pensions for those who have suffered for their country. It is this policy of service pensions that I am criticizing.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I wanted to ask the Senator if he did not realize that many men who served in the Spanish-American War are really suffering from injuries incurred in the service which they can not establish as the result of such service? This pension bill gives pensions only to those who are disabled for the performance of manual labor, which disabilities are not the result of their own vicious habits, and it further gives pensions to those who have arrived at the age of 62 years. I think this is a fair and just measure and I hope it may soon be enacted into law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator corroborates what I have been stating, that this is a service pension bill.

Mr. CURTIS. But, Mr. President, it requires that a man should have served 90 days.

Mr. KING. Yes; served 90 days. It is not a bill granting pensions for actual service upon the battle field. If a man enlisted for service in the military branch of the United States and was there 90 days, if he did not leave his own home, if he did not leave the camp to which he went, he would receive a pension under this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator knows that they all did leave their home camps.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that many of them did not leave the camps to which they were sent for training. I know that many who enlisted did not go to Cuba or go to the Philippines. There were thonsands who did not leave the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true, Mr. President. I think a majority of those in the Spanish-American War did not leave the United States. But what I meant was that they left their homes. I understood the Senator to say that many of them did not leave their homes.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think that some of them did not go very far away from their homes; that the camps were so near their homes that, comparatively speaking, they were within a stone's throw of their homes during the period of their enlistment. The Senator knows that a very large portion, perhaps a majority, of those who enlisted in the Spanish-American War did not leave the confines of the United States. I am not saying that at all to their discredit, because they possessed the same spirit possessed by our boys who enlisted or were drafted in the present war. They were resentful because they were retained in the United States. They wanted to get over the seas and do their part in driving back the forces of the Central Empires.

Mr. CURTIS. That was the statement I intended to make, that they were all anxious to go over, and many of them appealed to the President to be sent over, and could not go because the Government did not have the transports, or the troops were not needed overseas.

Mr. KING. Unquestionably. I do not mean to draw any distinction whatever between the patriotism of those who remained in the United States and that of those who went to Cuba or to Porto Rico or to the Philippine Islands. I recall that some of the troops enlisted in my own State for the Spanish-American War were not privileged to go to the Philippine Islands or to go to Cuba. The war ended before they could be sent beyond the United States. However, they were brave and splendid Americans and would have gladly given their lives for their country. It will be remembered by Senators that some of the Utah troops reached the Philippine Islands. There they did heroic and gallant service. The "Utah Battery" achieved fame and brought honor to the State and to our country.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the Senator that I made a special trip to Washington to have the Twentieth Kansas sent to the Philippines and the Twenty-third Kansas sent to Cuba.

Mr. KING. But this bill provides, Mr. President, that any person who has reached the age of 62 years shall be placed upon the pension roll, and his pension increases as he advances in years. When he reaches the age of 68 years the monthly pension is increased. When he reaches the age of 72 years his pension is still further increased. When he reaches the age of 75 years the maximum amount provided by this bill is awarded to him. These pensions are not dependent in the slightest degree upon whether or not he was injured or wounded or suffered any disability. His health may be perfect. He may be living in wealth and affluence, and still under the provisions of this bill be would be pensioned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there not some provision in the bill which limits it to those who need it?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are they to be pensioned without regard to their wealth or their earning capacity?

Mr. KING. Absolutely. That is the theory of the bill, if I interpret it aright.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I should be glad to have the Senator correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. NEW. The language of the bill is, after describing those to whom it shall refer—who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from any mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which so incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support.

It seems to me that that is broad enough.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator insist that the provisions found on page 2 are qualified and limited by the words to which the Senator has just called attention?

Mr. NEW. Yes; I do.

Mr. KING. I do not think that the construction of the Senator is correct, if he will pardon me. On page 2 the language is:

Provided, That any such person who has reached the age of 62 years shall, upon making proof of such fact, be placed upon the pension roll.

Mr. NEW. If that is the language to which the Senator refers, I misunderstood him. The age limit is not qualified by the other provision on page 1, of course.

Mr. KING. Then the statement which I made a moment ago is correct, namely, that when a person reaches the age of 62 years he is entitled to a pension regardless of his physical or mental condition?

Mr. NEW. Absolutely. That is exactly what the bill is meant to provide.

Mr. KING. He may be, as I said a moment ago, living in affluence and luxury; he may be receiving $10,000 or $100,000 a year from his efforts, mental or physical; he may not be in need of any aid from the Government, but we propose to pension him anyway. That is the theory of the bill.

Mr. NEW. That is true, but I ask the Senator from Utah if, in his zeal to safeguard the interests of the Treasury, he thinks that any man who had the patriotism to go out and fight for his country, is going to apply for a pension when he is fixed financially as the Senator describes? I think he is safeguarding the Treasury against raids from the wrong individual.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator review the cases which may have come under his own cognizance, cases to which his attention has been invited? I think he will find that persons of high standing, some of them not only earning large sums in their professions, but some of them possessing millions, have been paid pensions from the Treasury of the United States for services during the Civil War? The records of the Pension Office will disclose that those men—and I do not challenge their patriotism at all—did not feel any impropriety in taking the pensions provided by law.

Mr. NEW. Probably not; and I see no impropriety in their doing it, either. They were at least in the Army and served their country.

Mr. KING. I thought that the Senator was making an argument to the effect that no person who was wealthy and who had reached the age of 62 years, or who did not need the pension, would make a demand for it. I thought he challenged the inference that might be deduced from my observation that persons who did not need the pension would not ask it. His contention, I understood, was that they would not take the pension from the Government. Now he admits that they would, and that there would be no impropriety in doing it.

Mr. NEW. I do not think there is the slightest impropriety in their doing it, and I think the United States Government is amply justified in taking that sort of attitude toward the men who wore the uniform in time of war. What I say is that I do not believe there is the slightest danger of the United States Treasury being subjected to any considerable drain as the result of pensions being granted to individuals under the conditions set forth by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. But the Senator, as I understand him now—and I do not mean to be at all offensive, of course; I could not be toward my distinguished friend—has shifted his position. I was insisting that the pension bill provided that we should pension those who did not need it, who were worth millions, who suffered no injury or disability, and who are in perfect health. The Senator interrupted me to say, as I understood him, that we need have no apprehension that those persons would draw their pensions or drain the Treasury of the United States. Of course, they will not drain the Treasury of the United States. It is already drained. It will continue to be drained as long as the policy back of this bill, and other bills which the Republican Party is sponsoring and that some Democrats are aiding in passing, is perpetuated in this body and in the country.

Mr. NEW. I will admit that the Treasury of the United States is being drained, but it is not being drained by the soldiers who fought for the United States.

Mr. KING. Of course $300,000,000 a year, which we will pay for the year 1920 to the survivors of the Civil War and their families, is not much. Three hundred million dollars constituted one-third of the total revenue of the Government a short time prior to our entry into the present war. Three hundred million dollars would have purchased all of the property in some of the States of the Union prior to the war with Germany. Of course, $300,000,000 is not much. I am not complaining about it.

The $300,000,000 which we paid to the survivors of the Civil War last year, and we will pay that much or more this coming year, is only a small fraction of what this Republican Congress is going to appropriate for the coming fiscal year. Notwithstanding the protestations for economy, this Congress will probably appropriate five or six billion dollars for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921. This bill, of course, swells this tremendous volume and demands additional taxes from the American people, but that question does not seem to address itself to Republican statesmen. We are more interested in spending the money that is not in the Treasury of the United States than we are in pursuing a course of providence and ecenomy and efficiency in the administration of the affairs of the Government.

Mr. President, it would seem that Congress does not know what economy or efficiency is. It has been said that this session of Congress has been engaged in an orgy and saturnalia of extravagance and waste and profligacy in the expenditure of public funds. The war was over on the 11th day of November, 1918. Our expenditures before the war were substantially a billion dollars a year. Our expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, will be more than $6,000,000,000, and our expenditures for the coming year, which will end on the 30th of June, 1921, will be at least that amount, if not more.

If the Republican Party is not rebuked at the next election and a party elected which is pledged to economy, I venture the prediction that it will reach that stupendous sum. In discussing this question, as well as all others, I desire and hope to be fair, and will therefore state that I can not pay any particular compliment to my own party for its effort to check the extravagant appropriations made and enforce economy in the administration of governmental affairs. I shall not defend my own party when I conceive that it has confederated with Republicans in improper appropriations and has transgressed the rules of sound and economical administration.

As I had occasion to say a few days ago, the Democratic Party knows better than to be wasteful and extravagant. It knows that its history from Jefferson's time to Wilson's day is a glorious one; that it has always stood for efficient and honest administration of public affairs. It has a glorious history, and all Democrats should vindicate the principles for which their party stands. If it is guilty of extravagance, it should be more severely condemned than the Republican Party, because that party proverbially has been wasteful and inefficient in the affairs of government and has not professed as high standards of public morality as has the Democratic Party. We have professed economy, and yet we have so far surrendered to this spendthrift spirit that we joined in some of the appropriations that ought not to have been made at a time when the burdens of the Government are so tremendous and when the taxpayers of the country will have great difficulty in finding the means with which to meet the obligations placed upon them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has very kindly yielded to me to offer an amendment to the bill. I am called out of the Senate and can not remain longer just now.

I desire to offer an amendment which I proposed to H. R. 9369, known as the Fuller pension bill, which passed some days ago. I offer the same amendment to it, and the President will remember it was suggested that it had better be offered to the bill which is now pending.

I will read the amendment which I propose to offer. I propose as section 3 to the pending bill to insert:

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll, and who, while in the service of the United States in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $65 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, shall receive a pension at the rate of $72 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $90 per month.

The amendment which I now propose is in the so-called Fuller bill, and applies to those who served in the Civil War. I had no objection to that provision in the bill, and, in fact, supported it. Now I desire to make the same rule applicable to those who have been permanently disabled in the Spanish-American War and the Army generally.

Mr. OVERMAN. I observe that the Senator proposes to provide for those who lost both legs and both arms. Does he not think he ought to make some provision for a man who lost both eyes and is totally blind?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so. I would be glad to have that added.

There is no reason in the world why the men who served their country in the Spanish-American War or who have been serving the country in the Regular Army, which is entirely overlooked in all this pension legislation, and who have been totally disabled, should not receive a pension at the hands of the Government in the way I have suggested in the proposed amendment.

I think my friend, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], takes a pessimistic view of all this pension legislation. He is disposed to upbraid not only the Republicans but his Democratic colleagues also who happen to stand with the Republicans in the matter of pension legislation. I am not afraid to stand for it, Mr. President; I am not afraid to stand with my country to do justice to the men who have served the country; and it does not make any difference to me how much it costs, if it is within the bounds of reason, and within the capability and possibility of payment by this rich Government of ours.

My plea is that the Spanish-American War veteran who lost a limb and has become totally disabled, and the soldier who served in the Regular Army and became totally disabled, as provided in this section, shall be treated as the soldier of the Civil War has been treated.

Mr. President, may I say in this connection that there are very few men who will be pensioned under the amendment which I have offered? There are a few men in the Regular Army who while in the service lost an arm or a leg and are not receiving the benefits which the Civil War veterans receive under legislation applicable to them. There are a few men who served in the Spanish-American War who lost limbs who are covered by the amendment which I have offered who are not now receiving pensions. It is to meet those cases, Mr. President, that I propose this amendment.

When I offered the amendment, in the first instance, to the Fuller bill, the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] suggested that he would not oppose it if it were offered to a bill which was intended for the relief of Spanish-American War veterans, and I understood the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] to say he would not oppose such an amendment. I am, therefore, proposing it now because it is entirely germane to the subject of the bill now pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oregon if he will not accept the amendment which I will now suggest? At the end of the printed amendment I suggest that there be inserted the following words:

and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost both eyes, or been totally disabled in the same or who, in such service and in like manner, sustained injuries that proved the direct cause of the subsequent total loss of the sight of both eyes, shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Such a provision will take care of the totally blind.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to perfect my amendment by adding to it the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. I should like now to have the amendment stated as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as section 3 the following:

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll, and who, while in the service of the United States in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $65 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, shall receive a pension at the rate of $72 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $90 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost both eyes, or been totally disabled in the same or who, in such service and in like manner, sustained injuries that proved the direct cause of the subsequent total loss of the sight of both eyes, shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. NEW rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Indiana desire to interrupt me?

Mr. NEW. I merely desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. I do not wish now to say that I will not accept the amendment that the Senator from Oregon has offered. I desire an opportunity to read it, which I did not have the other day when he called my attention to it. I also desire an opportunity to obtain some figures for which I have sent before I finally pass judgment on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator from Indiana takes his seat I desire to suggest it is evident that the pending bill can not be finished this morning before 2 o'clock. There is on the calendar a short bill for the benefit of injured soldiers who are now taking rehabilitation training, which has been unanimously reported from the committee this morning. It has passed the other House. It contains a provision for a small increase of $20 per month for a certain class of ex-service men who are taking rehabilitation training. It is very important to them that they get the benefit of the proposed legislation at once. I do not believe the bill will take any time or that there will be any opposition to it. If the Senator from Indiana can not finish his bill to-day, if he would allow us 10 minutes to consider the bill to which I refer and to pass it, it will give immediate relief to men who need immediate relief.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one moment. I brought to the attention of the Senate this morning a letter from some 30 men who have lost arms or legs and others who have been seriously injured, suggesting that the bill only carried $5 increase to single men and $20 increase to married men. The bill reported to-day carries an increase of $20 to both, and it is conceded on all sides that it is essential to enable them to pay their expenses and to continue their rehabilitation studies. Many of them are really suffering now by reason of their condition. I believe the Senator from Indiana will lose no time on his bill by yielding to my request, because he can not finish his bill by 2 o'clock to-day, when the unfinished business will come up. If he will now let us have a few minutes' time for the consideration of the bill to which I refer, I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will yield for that purpose.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will give me his cooperation in pressing the pending bill, I think we can complete it well within the morning hour. Then I shall be glad to join him in trying to get his bill through in what remains of the morning hour. I am very sorry that I can not yield to oblige the Senator, for I always like to oblige a colleague wherever it is possible. However, it not possible now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has just reiterated the views which he has so eloquently expressed upon other occasions. It is a pleasant task to stand here and eulogize the American boy who has served his country. There is very great pleasure in praising the heroism and the valor and the manly and chivalrous conduct and qualities of the American soldier. But that pleasant task is often the prelude to demands for huge appropriations.

I presume the popular thing, Mr. President, is to favor appropriations. I know that the severest condemnation which I have received since I have been in the Senate, aside from that which came from certain radicals, has resulted from my opposition to appropriations. Men want appropriations out of the Federal Treasury. The Federal Government is, under the modern view, a huge dispenser of bounties, gifts, bonuses, and largesses; it is to be used as a sort of sponge to suck taxes out of the people, and then to be squeezed in order that the accumulations shall be distributed to the people. It is forgotten that in the process of absorbing and dispensing taxes that there is an immense portion of them expended in salaries, in overhead expenses, in waste, and in inefficiency, so that the amount finally paid to the people is materially less in quantity than that collected from them.

If I wanted to do the popular thing I would enthusiastically support this bill. I have no doubt the Senator from Indiana will receive hundreds of letters and telegrams congratulating him upon his splendid and patriotic course in championing this bill. Of course, I do not mean to say that such expressions would influence the Senator in the slightest degree in what he conceives to be his duty, because all who know the distinguished Senator appreciate that he is actuated by the highest spirit of patriotism and devotion to duty. It is a fact, however, that many of the American people are deeply interested in securing appropriations from the Federal Treasury and opposition to their wishes does not meet with their approval. Appeals are made, as the Senator knows, for Federal appropriations for subjects that are purely local in their nature or come within the activities and duties and responsibilities of individuals. The Federal Government is constantly appealed to by individuals, communities, and States for appropriations to aid them in matters that are clearly local or individual or pertain only to the States.

That spirit, Mr. President, and the feeling that the Federal Government is a dispenser of gifts and bounties have so strongly taken possession of many of the American people that they seek to repudiate responsibilities which rest upon them; the States are shirking their duties and responsibilities and abdicating power and authority which under our form of government rest upon them. There seems to be a mad rush for Federal aid and Federal interposition in respect of matters that are purely local or individual or State in character.

The latest manifestation of this spirit is found in the persistent appeals for pension bills—not pensions for those who have been hurt, who have been wounded, or who have suffered disability in the service of their country; as I have stated, bills of that character we should gladly support—but appeals are made for appropriations and gifts and bounties for individuals, organizations, and enterprises that should not receive cognizance from the Federal Government.

My good friend from Oregon has just alluded to an amendment which he suggested to the Fuller bill, and has called attention to the fact that he intends to offer that amendment, with some modification, to the pending bill. No one, Mr. President, can object to pensions being paid to those who received injuries while in the military or naval service of our country. I will join with the Senators from Oregon and Indiana, and with any other Senator, in providing liberal and just pensions for all soldiers and sailors who suffered disabilities in the service of their country, but I am opposed to mere service pensions—to giving men pensions merely because they were nominally in the military or naval service but a few days, and who never saw a battle field, never participated in any clash of arms, never heard the roar of cannon, or suffered any disability whatever.

As I have stated, this bill does not even limit its provisions to those who need pensions or those who are suffering from any physical or mental disability. The command is for all whose names appear upon the military or naval rolls of the United States during the period of the Spanish-American War to come forward and receive pensions from the Government.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah pardon me?

Mr. KING. I promised to yield first to the Senator from Georgia. As soon as I have yielded to him I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wanted to add to what I said a few minutes ago a word further upon the importance of immediate action on this bill, H. R. 12266. It is only a bill to increase $20 a month the allowance for soldiers who were injured in the recent war who are now taking rehabilitation training, and it is the opinion of all that this increase is essential to enable them to pay their expenses. It is a measure that we can not well delay, and it stands upon a substantially different footing from the bill now before the Senate. That is a bill looking toward permanent compensation to these Spanish-American veterans, and its consideration will not be finished to-day. It can come up to-morrow. It started with the right of way this morning. I will vote to-morrow morning to take it up as soon as we finish the consideration of the other bill to which I refer.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia introduces the personal element into this matter somewhat. If the Senator from Utah will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. KING. I yield to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. I should like to say that I, too, have personal reasons for wanting to get through with the consideration of this bill at the earliest possible moment. I have made arrangements to leave Washington to-morrow evening, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has given notice that he proposes to address the Senate to-morrow on a subject of very great importance, and I very earnestly hope that opportunity will be given for consideration and a vote on this bill without the interposition of other measures, which, however pressing they may be, are no more pressing than this. Notice was duly given yesterday that this bill would be brought up at this time, and it is up pursuant to that motion, and, as I said awhile ago, if the Senator from Georgia will cooperate in bringing about a vote on this bill, I think we can get it out of the way in time to permit the consideration of the bill to which he refers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the bill now before the Senate can be disposed of by 2 o'clock. Substantial amendments have been offered to it. It involves a very large sum of money. It involves questions of great importance, involving the policy of the United States, and I do not believe it will be disposed of by 2 o'clock to-day. It is for that reason, in part, that I suggest the substitution of House bill 12266, and, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12266.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fernald	Knox	Smith, Ga.
Ball	France	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Gay	Nelson	Smoot
Capper	Glass	New	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Gronna	Nugent	Swanson
Colt	Hale	Overman	Thomas
Comer	Harris	Phipps	Trammell
Culberson	Harrison	Pittman	Underwood
Curtis	Henderson	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Kenyon	Sheppard	Warren
Edge	Keyes	Simmons	Williams
Elkins	King	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent, due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Since I made the motion to proceed to the consideration of House bill 12266, the bill reported this morning from the Committee on Education and Labor, the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor has come into the Chamber, and I have had a conference with him; I yield to his view that it is not advisable to press the motion at this time. I know he will seek to bring it up at the next morning hour when an opportunity is presented, and for that reason I think it best not to press the motion. It is therefore my purpose to withdraw the motion, with the consent of the Senate.

I am very deeply interested in the measure. I consider it of immediate importance, and I believe I explained before that evidently the information received by the wounded soldiers, contained in the letter which I presented to the Senate earlier in the day, was inaccurate. I do not know upon what they predicated it, but this bill meets the very criticism that they suggested. It adds $20 a month to the amount received by married men as well as single men, and does not discriminate between the two.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question in that connection. I have received a number of communications, not exactly of the character referred to by the Senator, but the inquiries were with respect to the relief to be granted those who were injured in the recent war, and what provision the Government actually had made to care for them and to educate them, vocationally or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am reasonably familiar with the provisions with reference to vocational rehabilitation. There is a provision, and many are now taking advantage of it, by which those injured in the service, where the injuries interfere with their capacity to perform the callings which they have pursued before their injury, can be sent to schools and colleges to receive general and technical training with the view of fitting them to resume activities in life. The difficulty recently has been that on account of the increased expenses incident to their studies and work they were unable to get along on the amount they were receiving. This bill from the House increases by $20 a month the amount received by both the single and the married men, carrying the payments to the single men up to $100 a month, and the payments to the married men up to $120 a month. It has been unanimously reported out by the Committee on Education and Labor, and I feel sure that it will pass the Senate without resistance.

Mr. KENYON. I would like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The vocational training bill is not before the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. I rose and asked permission to withdraw my motion to have the bill taken up, mentioning the fact that the Senator from Iowa had come into the Chamber, and that he really has charge of it, and I stated that it is his purpose to call it up at the earliest possible moment. Then the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] asked me a further question, and I was trying to answer it.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat I would like to have him explain the justification of these criticisms of the Vocational Board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would take so long a time that I could not undertake to go into it now. There are a great many of them which are entirely unjust. Necessarily there are occasional failures to connect meritorious cases with proper training, but, as a whole, my advices from the men who are receiving the training are very commendatory.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, a number of letters which I have received would seem to lead to the belief that the board has ceased to function.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I feel sure such a view does injustice to the board.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEW. If what is going on between the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is not strictly confidential, we would like to hear it in this part of the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have insisted upon sitting down.

Mr. KING. I can assure the Senator from Indiana that it was not confidential; it will appear in the RECORD. I was interested in knowing whether the charges which were made against the Vocational Board have any justification. The Senator from Georgia had referred to the provision which the Government had made to care for those who were injured in the recent war.

That leads me back to the subject which is under discussion, and from which I was diverted a moment ago by the Senator from Georgia, and by his motion to supplant the pending bill by the measure recently reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, which deals with the rehabilitation of those who have suffered injuries in the recent war.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] interrupted me, with my consent, for the purpose of offering an amendment. That amendment, as he explained, provides for additional compensation for those who received serious injuries in the Spanish-American War. I expressed the view that I am entirely in sympathy with any legislation which provides compensation for soldiers and sailors who were injured in the service of their country.

The Senator from Oregon entered upon a discussion of the duties of the Government to care for those who had served it, and expressed the view that he is in entire sympathy with all pension legislation, legislation which gave pensions to men who never saw the smoke of battle, who never heard the roar of the guns, who were never within a thousand miles of any battle field, who never rendered an hour in real military or naval service, but who had their names upon the rolls of some company, but perhaps were there but for a few days, and scarcely left their own homes.

I stated that it seemed to be popular to support legislation calling for huge pensions from the Federal Government; that any measure seemed to be popular which aimed to secure money from the Federal Treasury to be expended for individual or community or purely State purposes. I stated, in substance, that whether the question had any relation whatever to the functions of the Federal Government was regarded as immaterial. We find protagonists in favor of every scheme for Federal action and Federal appropriation. The most fantastic schemes find their advocates, and the visionary phantasms of the impractical and the disordered aberrations of doctrinaires are presented and find earnest apostles in their support.

If there is a neurotic in the United States who has some wild scheme, he or she immediately comes to Congress, and the scheme will be presented, newspapers will advocate it, and there will soon be developed apparently a tremendous sentiment in favor of it. It is wholly immaterial that it has no relation to the general public welfare, or is wholly disconnected from truly national activity or the functions of the National Government.

I have sometimes wondered, Mr. President, if the American people had lost sight of the fact that we have a constitutional form of government, that the Federal Government is one of enumerated and limited powers. There seems to be a growing sentiment that the Federal Government has no limitations upon its powers, that it may do anything that the Kaiser could have done, or that the greatest autocrat might have done in any age of the world. There are some who talk about democracy who are entirely ignorant of its meaning. They appear to believe that democracy merely means the interposition of the United States into the affairs of individuals or the States of the Union and the assumption by the Federal Government of the prerogatives and duties of individuals and States. Anything, in their view, is democratic if the Federal Government is back of it. Under the view of some the majority may sanctify any scheme that its rightfulness is authenticated, if a majority of the people support it. The question of whether it is right or constitutional, or in harmony with the spirit and genius of our institutions is of no consequence.

Mr. President, our Government is founded not only to protect majorities but to protect minorities. It may be that the plan which the majority may desire may receive temporarily their support, yet our Government is a constitutional one, and it has grown up as the result of the experience of the past, which demonstrated that the voice of the people was not always the voice of God; that majorities are not always right; indeed, that they are often wrong.

Our Government is the result of travail and of suffering, of bloodshed and of sorrow; it is an evolution from the archaic conditions, the obsolete forms of the past, and the work of the fathers was to establish a written Constitution which would put hooks into the jaws of those who sought to impose their will, though they might have temporarily a majority of the people behind them, upon the minority.

The Constitution of the United States and our form of government are interested in protecting the minority, in protecting that which has been won by our fathers, and which, as I stated, is the product of evolutionary growth. The Constitution of the United States did not spring, as Minerva, from the brow of Jove. Mr. Gladstone was not quite accurate in his famous characterization of its inception and birth. It was an evolutionary growth. It was the result of the accretions of the past. It was a crystallization into law of the precedents that were justified by the experiences of the past, and a crystallization of the very best thought of preceding generations.

Now, the thought upon the part of many is that we must abolish the restrictions imposed by our organic law. If some wild, visionary scheme is suggested, and some thoughtful person says that it is unconstitutional, immediately the cry is made that the Constitution is reactionary; that it is for the purpose of protecting predatory interests; that it is against the spirit of liberalism and democracy and progress and development. So we find throughout the country various individuals, and some political schools, interested in not only changing some parts of the Constitution, modifying it to suit their views, but they would change it entirely.

As I said a moment ago, we find demands made that the Federal Government should go into the States and take care of their local affairs, that they should assume control of their courts, that the Federal Government should take charge of marriage and divorce as a subject of national concern. Already the Federal Government has taken over a large part of the police powers of the States, surrendered by the States under the eighteenth amendment. It is seeking to take over additional powers of the States, and the people are now surrendering to the Federal Government that indispensable power and prerogative of a sovereign State—the power to determine who the electors shall be. Little by little, Mr. President, the corroding influences are at work to undermine the form of government which has been handed down to us by the fathers, and I protest now, as I have heretofore, against this iconoclastic spirit which is manifesting itself, against this spirit which demands that the Federal Government shall superimpose its power upon the States and assume obligations and responsibilities which, under our form of government, rest upon the States, and which must rest upon the States and be discharged by the States if this Republic shall live.

Mr. President, local self-government is the key to the perpetuity of this Republic, and whenever the people cease to have regard for local self-government, cease to have pride in local self-government, and are willing that the National Government shall assume functions and powers and responsibilities and duties of the States then this Republic will fall.

This spirit of which I have been speaking manifests itself in a demand that we shall pension practically everybody who has been in any way connected with the Government; pension all civil employees; pension all who were in the Army or in the Navy at any time. Whether they are wounded, whether they are injured, whether they suffered any disabilities, whether they are in need of pensions are questions wholly immaterial, and the bill before us calls for the pensioning of men though they may be as rich as Crœsus and in perfect health.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 8078.

Mr. CURTIS rose.

Mr. NEW. I hope that the Senator from Kansas will be willing to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business in order that we may proceed with the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. CURTIS. If there are no other long speeches to be made on the bill and if it is likely to reach a vote in a few moments, I should be very glad to ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily, but that can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that I have not concluded my remarks on the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope, under the circumstances, that the Senator from Indiana will not ask that the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. NEW. I, of course, am very much entertained by the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and I hope the continuity of his speech may not be unnecessarily interrupted. I will renew my request.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand there would be objection by Senators on the other side of the aisle who desire to speak on the unfinished business, and I therefore hope the Senator will not insist upon his request.

Mr. NEW. Very well.

THE DYE INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Knox	Simmons
Ball	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Gay	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Capper	Hale	McKellar	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THOMAS resumed the speech begun by him yesterday. After having spoken, with interruptions, for an hour and a half,

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think this matter is so important that there should be more Senators present, and I suggest——

Mr. THOMAS. They will not stay; there is no need of asking for a quorum.

Mr. KENYON. They might stay on this profit question.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish the Senator would not do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2528) to grant certain lands to the city of Pocatello, State of Idaho, for conserving and protecting the source of its water supply and as a municipal park site, which were, on page 1, line 10, after "State," to insert "containing 2,880 acres"; on page 1, line 13, to strike out "and as a municipal park site"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to grant certain lands to the city of Pocatello, State of Idaho, for conserving and protecting the source of its water supply."

Mr. NUGENT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. KEYES, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico conferees on the part of the Senate.

LANDS IN UTAH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3016) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "limited" and insert "limits"; on page 1, line 4, after "the," to insert "future"; on page 2, line 4, to strike out all after "discretion" down to and including "or" in line 6.

The motion was agreed to.

TOWN OF PETERSBURG, ALASKA.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. For just a moment.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 4286 at this time. It will not lead to any debate. It is the last bill on the printed calendar. It is a bill authorizing the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds for the purpose of installing a municipal electric light and power plant and for the construction of a public-school building.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield for that purpose if it does not lead to discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CURTIS. With the understanding that it does not interfere with the unfinished business, I shall not object.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly. It will take but a moment to dispose of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4286) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000 for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant and for the construction of a public-school building," approved September 29, 1919, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000 for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant and for the construction of a public-school building," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $150,000 for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant and for the construction of a public-school building."

SEC. 2. That section 5 of the act mentioned in the preceding section is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That no part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and under the order and direction of said common council from time to time as the same may be required for said purposes: Provided, That not to exceed $115,000 of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds shall be expended for the construction and installation of the electric light and power plant, and not to exceed $35,000 thereof shall be expended for the construction of the public-school building."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE DYE INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. THOMAS resumed his speech, and after having spoken for about 30 minutes,

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 5, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 4, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the faith sublime, the star of hope, the love divine, the golden links which bind us to Thee and our fellow men, in sunshine or cloud, in victory or defeat, in happiness or sorrow, in life or death.

To doubt is to weaken character. Faith is to strengthen it. To question is to corrode it. Hope keeps it bright and shining. To hate is fatal. To love is life and that more abundantly. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AERONAUTIC ENGINEERING.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I call from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8314) to provide for the training of officers in the Army in aeronautic engineering, and the issue and equipment of material therefor, with the Senate amendment thereto, and move to agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the bill H. R. 8314, with Senate amendment thereto. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order on the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendment is practically in the language of the House bill, with this exception: The House bill provided that the supplies and equipment required for the use of the schools should also be given by the War Department to the schools. The Senate struck that provision from the bill, so that the tuition of the students and their textbooks and supplies alone shall be furnished by the War Department. The Senate amendment also provides that the money for this purpose shall be taken from the Air Service appropriation of the Army instead of from the general appropriations for the Army.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order, but I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Do these officers, while they are detailed to attend school, get the extra compensation that is provided for aviators?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman not think that the Senate is to be congratulated on amending the House bill the way it did, so as to protect the funds of the Treasury against expenditure for purposes which were included in the House bill?

Mr. KAHN. The House provision allowed some of the surplus of the equipment that the War Department had on hand to be given over to the schools.

Mr. GARNER. This is the first instance I have noted where there was not a keen competition between the House and Senate Military Affairs Committees as to which could be most liberal in its provisions. I congratulate the Senate on amending this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROADS—DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 13677) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems and to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the conference report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13677) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems and to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 5, and 6, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "transferred from the appropriation made in paragraph (g) of the said section 204 and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the House.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13677) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems and to supply urgent deficiencies in certain other appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

On Nos. 1 and 2, relating to the paragraph authorizing deductions from the amount found due from the United States to certain short-line railroads the sums found due by those railroads to the United States: Strikes out the language, inserted by the Senate, requiring the sums found due the United States to be deducted from the amount of the "deficit or decrease" of the operating income of the railway, and inserts the language, proposed by the Senate, making clear that the sums deducted as due the railway administration shall be credited to the proper appropriations for the railway administration.

On No. 3: Inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, authorizing and directing the Auditor for the Navy Department to pay the San Francisco Bridge Co. the sum of $128,260.60 appropriated in the deficiency act approved March 6, 1920.

On Nos. 4, 5, and 6, relating to the Senate: Inserts the appropriation of $7,500 to pay the widow of Hon. John H. Bankhead, late a Senator from the State of Alabama, and inserts the paragraph appropriating $16,990.95 for repairs, improvements, equipment, and supplies for Senate kitchens and restaurants.

JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the first amendment of the Senate has to do with the provision providing offset which is authorized in the matter of making settlements with the short-line railroads. The House bill carried a provision and the Senate put on an amendment, No. 1, and no one has been able to tell us just what the Senate amendment means, unless it is to enlarge the Government's obligation under section 204 of the transportation act. This being the case, the Senate receded with regard to that item.

The second amendment made more certain and more definite the manner in which the set-off should be applied.

The third amendment is one that was requested by the auditor of the Navy Department making a settlement under the appropriation for the San Francisco Bridge Co. in the building of the drydock at Honolulu. An appropriation was carried of $128,000, as recommended by the Navy Department, in the last deficiency appropriation bill, but the auditor was unwilling to certify the amount and permit the payment until the bridge company had signed a release of all further claims against the Government growing out of the construction of that drydock. The House conferees saw no objection on the part of the Government to this release, and they were advised that there was no objection on the part of the contractor and so we were perfectly willing to accept the Senate amendment in that respect. It does not carry an appropriation, but provides for a release.

Amendment No. 5 of the Senate provides for payment to Mrs. Bankhead, widow of the late Senator John H. Bankhead, of Alabama, of the regular amount carried in similar cases.

Senate amendment No. 6 calls for an appropriation of $16,990.95 to pay the deficit in the matter of the conduct of Senate restaurant. There was something of a deficit in the last deficiency appropriation bill. We were advised that they had changed their plan of running the restaurant in the Senate, and during last month there was something of a balance left after paying all expenses. We are advised by the Senate that this is to clean up their obligations for conducting the Senate restaurant up to the 1st of April and that there will be no deficit in the future.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, does this bill represent the total amount that has been appropriated this season for railroads?

Mr. GOOD. The total amount at this session of Congress; yes. Seven hundred and fifty million dollars were appropriated during the first session of this Congress for that purpose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And this amounts to how much for the railroads?

Mr. GOOD. This appropriation here amounts to $300,000,000, and it also makes available approximately $90,000,000 in cash by authorizing the War Finance Corporation to buy Liberty and Victory bonds held by the Railroad Administration to that amount and to turn over to the Railroad Administration $90,000,000 for those bonds.

So that they will have approximately $390,000,000 in cash as a result of this legislation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman anticipate any more money will be required in the near future for the railroads?

Mr. GOOD. I hope not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Could the gentleman state approximately how much the total cost has been so far of Government control of railroads?

Mr. GOOD. The Director General of Railroads estimated that the total amount of the deficit—that is, the actual loss to the Government—in the 26 months of Government operation of the railroads was $904,000,000, in round numbers. Of course, it will be more than that. There are other expenses that will be paid out of the transportation act.

The transportation act carried $200,000,000—and I was in error a moment ago when I said the amount carried in the bill was all this Congress appropriated for the operation of the railroads—the transportation act carried $200,000,000 to pay losses of Government operation. It also carried $300,000,000 of direct appropriations for the making of loans and the paying of judgments that might be rendered on account of Federal control and operation of the railroads. Then it carries, as I recollect, provisions in regard to indefinite appropriations where money may be required and paid out of the Treasury when ascertained under certain conditions by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that, in fact, by the passage of this bill at this session of Congress we will have appropriated more than $900,000,000 in various ways?

Mr. GOOD. The transportation act carries two separate appropriations, one for $300,000,000 and one for $200,000,000, or $500,000,000. The $300,000,000 has to do indirectly with Federal control but directly is not all chargeable to Federal control. It is to make loans to the railroads in the future to pay the judgments growing out of Federal control. Now, the extent to which that $300,000,000 may be chargeable to Federal control I am unable to state. Mr. Hines and Mr. Sherley estimated that the judgments would amount to $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. Now, this bill carries an appropriation of $300,000,000 and provides sales of Government bonds, $90,000,000, or $390,000,000, making $590,000,000 directly chargeable to Federal control and operation. Then, of the $300,000,000 that is appropriated for the purpose of making loans to the railroads in the future and to pay judgments approximately $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 it is estimated will be chargeable to Federal control. So it can be said that this session of Congress has appropriated or made available for losses growing out of Federal control approximately $620,000,000 and $270,000,000 for loans to be made to the railroads in the future.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that the estimated loss of about $904,000,000 on Government control just about covers the amount of extra compensation over and above what the railroad companies had been paying, which were granted by Mr. McAdoo and Mr. Hines?

Mr. GOOD. Compensation to employees?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; the extra compensation would amount to around better than a billion dollars a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us see about that. Mr. McAdoo allowed $754,000,000 at one time, and Mr. Hines allowed $67.000,000 at one time and then granted other allowances——

Mr. GOOD. That is for one year.

Mr. BLANTON. And did it not approximate just about the loss?

Mr. GOOD. No. This covers a period of 26 months, and the increase of wages would amount to better than a billion dollars a year, which would be considerably over $2,000,000,000 in extra compensation paid out during the 26 months.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. For a question.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. What additional compensation for the railroads in the way of increased rates was made to take care of that extra compensation?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Hines stated at a former hearing that such increases amounted to about 25 per cent, and in his last report to the President he shows that the amount in passenger fares was considerably over 25 per cent and increased rates in freight was more than 30 per cent, and the average is around a little better than 30 per cent all told during the time the roads were operated by the Government.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Would the total increase of fares and freight rates take care of the increased compensation to the employees?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, not by any means, and that is the reason why it is necessary to appropriate about a billion dollars. Mr. Hines said it would have taken about 14 or 15 per cent on all freight rates in addition to the increase made in order to make up this shortage.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I do.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman if any portion of the shortage coming during the period of the occupancy by the National Government was due to the fact, if such fact exists, that the railroads were carrying soldiers and freight for the Government for a less compensation——

Mr. GOOD. That was all paid for.

Mr. JUUL. The United States has paid for that?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; that was all paid for out of the appropriation for the Army and Navy.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman referred to $300,000,000 provided for loans to the railroads. Is that sum available now?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. It has been appropriated and the Interstate Commerce Commission has full charge of it.

Mr. RHODES. That hardly covers the point. Has the time come when actual loans are being made from this $300,000,000 appropriation?

Mr. GOOD. Well, I do not know that any loans are being made now.

Mr. RHODES. How soon will those loans be made?

Mr. GOOD. That is up to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They investigate applications for such loans and approve or disapprove them. Applications must be made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they pass final judgment under the transportation act.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do.

Mr. TINCHER. Do I understand from our experience under Government operation of railroads that it is safe to state that it cost this Government around a billion dollars?

Mr. GOOD. It will cost more than that; it will cost nearer a billion and a quarter before we get through paying the losses.

Mr. VARE. That loss does not include the possible damages which will accrue from the depreciation of the roads when they were turned back?

Mr. GOOD. Well, that is a question that there is some controversy about between the director general and the railroad companies and one on which the committee have not expressed a judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13870, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13870, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13870, the sundry civil appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I dare say that this House has already learned that the great supply bill now under consideration contains but a small appropriation, comparatively speaking, for the enforcement of the so-called Volstead law. Of course, I want the House to know that there were requests made of our committee for vast sums of the people's money, to be expended on prohibition plans, but they have been denied, so far as this bill is concerned, almost in toto.

I have an idea that Congressmen generally do not know what amounts have already been set aside for the departments whose powers and duties have been extraordinarily increased by the national prohibition act. Likewise it is not generally known what sums have been asked for and refused. And so I want to give the House a few figures which will interest you, and they ought to amaze the country when properly digested.

Months ago the Bureau of Internal Revenue received for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, $2,000,000 for the enforcement of that act. We gave it another $1,000,000 in the deficiency act approved March 6, 1920, for the employment of guards and payment of other expenses in protecting intoxicating liquors in bonded and other warehouses.

The Department of Justice in the national prohibition act received $100,000 for the prosecution of violations of the act.

These three sums make a total for the fiscal year 1920 of $3,100,000.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the Bureau of Internal Revenue has received approximately $4,000,000 for the enforcement of the prohibition act, and the Department of Justice has requested $300,000 for the prosecution of violations of the act.

The Customs Service has requested $2,000,000 for use in connection with the patrol of the Mexican and Canadian borders and additional facilities at the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf ports.

These three sums aggregate $6,300,000. The amounts enumerated are items which are specifically considered for the enforcement of prohibition. Do not forget that other services of the Government which receive lump-sum appropriations for performance of the activities intrusted to them are using and will use a portion of such sums in connection with the enforcement of prohibition.

It is impossible to tell what these amounts will be. For instance, the Coast Guard will perform services in connection with the prevention of smuggling intoxicating liquors at the various ports. The Department of Justice will expend considerable sums of the appropriations for the expenses of United States courts, including salaries of district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals, and general court expenses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, by the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act we have cut off $444,000,000 of revenue from willing taxpayers and already substituted $6,300,000 appropriations for hungry tax eaters who are willing to engage in the work of spying on their fellows to discover violations of the law. The chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, Mr. WARREN, of Wyoming, estimated the cost of enforcing prohibition at $50,000,000 a year by National and State authorities. From the increased activities of the economic experts and the typewriters of the prohibition enforcement office I am inclined to accept Senator WARREN'S estimates of $50,000,000 cost as conservative, for the estimates grow as the applications from good prohibitionists for employment in the Government service increase. But in addition to this Government expenditure, the Anti-Saloon League has appealed to the people for $27,920,300 to enable it to assist the Government in enforcing the Volstead law. Taking these estimates of Senator WARREN and the Anti-Saloon League together, we have an outlay of $88,000,000 by the Federal Government and the people of the United States as the cost of prohibition, in place of an income of $444,000,000 as the revenues from the lack of prohibition, and this at a time, my friends, when the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the majority leader, is devoting all his spare hours to figuring up the economies of the present Republican control of Congress.

And yet my friend, Commissioner Roper, before he quit the job as Commissioner of Internal Revenue, expressed the hope that this Volstead law, like the tax laws, would be effective by the "observance of the law by the people of their own volition." I am not surprised at the resignation of Dan Roper after the estimates for prohibition enforcement began to fall upon his desk like the leaves in autumn. He had observed 4,000,000 people in the United States paying $8,000,000,000 taxes, and he did not realize that those 4,000,000 willing observers of the tax laws constituted only 3 per cent of the population, or that they lived in New England, the North Atlantic, or Central States, where great cities and big industries abound; or that New York paid more of those $8,000,000,000 taxes than all the old prohibition States combined. He had not analyzed the close affinity between prohibition and appropriations, or the willingness of prohibitionists to permit "George" to pay the bills.

The commissioner's last report, published a few months ago, has some illuminating figures on the enforcement of prohibition in prohibition States, mark you, even before the saving grace of national prohibition had extended its beneficent influence over our all-American continent. In the year 1918 the internal-revenue agents seized 6,889 illicit stills and 300,000 gallons of liquor, valued at more than $2,000,000 in the pioneer prohibition States. Georgia came first, with 2,006 illicit stills; North Carolina followed, with 1,534 illicit stills and more than 100,000 gallons of moonshine rum; Alabama, 752; South Carolina, 488; Tennessee, 386; Virginia, 546; Kentucky, 121; Florida, 191; Michigan, 40; even the home State of the first apostle of grape juice, Nebraska, 26; West Virginia, 40; and Texas, 41.

And, mark you, in that same report the commissioner complained that the State and local authorities embarrassed his agents in hunting down the moonshiners or he would have had a better report of seizure of illicit liquor.

Mark you, my colleagues, these figures came to us as a result of but State-wide prohibition here and there in this fair land of ours. What will the next report tell us about the growth and progress and popularity of the "still" industry throughout America? Will there be a single one of our 48 States under national prohibition that will be able to show a clean bill of health? Do the daily reports of the newspapers about the activities of the prohibition enforcement officers give any indication that there is a single one of our American communities where the "still" has failed to find warm welcome and cordial entertainment? [Laughter.]

Do you recall the glorious word pictures of conditions soon to be in America when nation-wide prohibition entered into our daily life and activities?

Some few years back I tried to tell the Congress that I feared the eloquent and sanctified pleaders for that law were romancing and now we know, if we know anything, that prohibition has revived in this land the spirit of romance and adventure as no other nation-wide movement ever could have even hoped to revive it.

For instance, what is more romantic to my distinguished colleague on the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GOOD], our very able chairman, and to the leader of the majority in this House [Mr. MONDELL] than the fantastic estimates for appropriations for the enforcement of prohibition and the Volstead law? Do not forget, my prohibition friends, that this law was to enforce itself by the good people of America accepting its one-half of 1 per cent.

Do you remember the romantic prophecies that crime would vanish from that portion of God's footstool known as the United States of America; that our penitentiaries would soon become deserted wildernesses; and that our county jails and poor farms would almost instanter shut up shop, pull down the shades, and await peacefully the transformation into a new status where the reformed among our American men and women would hie themselves to join in Te Deums to the Lord of Holies for the new and blessed life brought to all of us by national prohibition? Has this happened? What are the facts? I challenge contradiction of my statement that crime, real crime, not arrests for drunkenness, is on the increase in every part of this country.

The Illinois Bankers' Association presents some interesting comparisons as to one class of crime. In the year 1916 there were 15 attacks on banks in that State, with a total loss of $30,321; in 1917 there were 29 attacks on banks, with a total loss of $111,177.08; in 1918, 32 such attacks, with a total loss of $178,669.80; and in 1919 there were 119 attacks on banks, with a total loss of $807,000.

I do not have to tell this House that Illinois was a wet State in 1916, and the 15 attacks on banks were attributed to that condition by the prohibitionists. They said that liquor made men wild and sent them into the banks to take away the treasure of the people. But in 1919 Illinois was dry, and the bank burglaries increased to 119, or eight times as many with a total loss twenty-seven times as great as in 1916.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Not now. This is one of the benefits of prohibition. Illinois is now discussing the necessity of a mounted State police to protect the people in the small towns and villages and the rural districts from the crime that has followed prohibition.

Let us consider conditions right here in Washington before our own eyes, where we had prohibition even before its blessings had been felt in other sections of our country. I now quote Mr. F. A. Sebring, clerk of the Police Court of the District of Columbia, explaining to the subcommittee on the District appropriation bill why his court needed more money than ever before to handle the growing volume of its business.

Mr. DAVIS. Has your business increased?
Mr. SEBRING. Yes, sir.
Mr. DAVIS. Except that the increase seems to be greater last year than in previous years.
Mr. SEBRING. Yes, sir.

Then my good friend [Mr. SISSON], a member of the committee, said:

It looks like our prohibition theory has not worked very well.

And everybody knows Mr. SISSON is one of the leading prohibitionists in this House.

Mr. SEBRING. It is a fact that it has not decreased our business. I will say this, that probably we have not had so many charged with drunkenness in the police court, but crime of all kinds has increased, larceny, disorderly conduct, carrying concealed weapons, assault with a dangerous weapon, fornication, and everything else; why I do not know!

I hear some one say that prohibition has decreased the population of the insane asylums in the West. Well, we recently found an escaped lunatic from a western asylum murdering a church warden in the very sanctuary of the church in the city of New York, did we not?

I said a moment ago that the spirit of adventure, too, had come to life again here in America. Do you doubt it? Why, the adventures and hazards of getting a drink nowadays are the most popular literature of the day. [Laughter.] I venture to say that there are men in this Congress who, if they dared, could unfold a tale of their own experience in running the gantlet of the District liquor squad or the search of their automobiles at the District line, of interviews with bootleggers, or of doctors who fear to write prescriptions. You know that blind tigers are now surrounded by romance, if not respectability, and that bootleggers now have a clientele that formerly belonged only to the national banks or the trust companies. [Laughter.] Moonshiners are no longer among the outcasts of society, for the practice has become just as common among the cliff dwellers of the big cities as it always has been in the mountains of North Carolina or Tennessee. In the old days in the South men made moonshine, I am told, not because they liked moonshine, but because they were determined to resist the invasion of their homes by Federal agents, who sought to enforce a law the people of the South rebelled against and would not observe. And right here, may I say to you, that the most thrilling tales of adventure are found in the reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, where is detailed the hairbreadth escapes of Federal agents in chasing moonshine; here you can read the story of gun play and deliberate murder, and here you will learn how Uncle Sam's revenue men have often stopped in their work to bury the remains of their dead comrades shot down in the mountainous regions of the Southland while engaged in the performance of their official duties. Oh, I fear that there will be other places thus pictured than those below the Mason and Dixon line when the official story for 1920 is told in writing. Already our Federal prohibition commissioner has advised us how men nowadays have been known to risk their lives to get a drink of liquor, and how his agents always hourly risk their lives in their efforts to prevent the national appetite of man to be appeased from having its play.

Mr. Chairman, although the Great War has ended, you will be interested to know that service in Uncle Sam's Navy is even in these days surrounded by adventure and hazard. Since the Coast Guard has gone back to the Treasury Department and become the patrol of the seas to guard us from smuggled rum, the Navy is compelled to sneak into our ports camouflaged, as in the war, to dodge the German submarines; and only the other day Secretary Daniels complained to Secretary Houston that one of the Navy submarines returning from Guantanamo had been fired upon by a Coast Guard ship on suspicion that the sub was a low-lying pirate craft smuggling Cuban rum into Florida. [Laughter.] Four years ago several German submarines dived under our battleships and popped up out of the water in a New England harbor. I begin to fear lest our grand Navy will have to adopt the German tactics and dive under the vigilant Coast Guard to make its home ports, for whether we build a navy or not we must appropriate for the Coast Guard to enable it to cut off smuggling of rum from Cuba.

The adventures of the Navy will not be more thrilling than those of the Air Service, with rival fleets of airplanes guarding the Texas border, one fleet looking for Mexican bandits coming across to murder our Texas brethren and the other spying on it to prevent the importation of mescal. We may have peace with all the world and continue to have war on the sea and in the air in our own country with prohibition ships and planes fighting warships and planes returning from foreign service for their country. It is a great game and it costs just like war. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we are about to celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, and I am reminded of Gov. Bradford's confession in that wonderful diary, which is now known as the History of the Plymouth Plantations. The Pilgrims, and later the Puritans, tried to make the people good by statute, and Gov. Bradford confessed that it was like damming a stream where the waters continued to flow and climb until by their weight the dam broke and there was a disastrous flood. So he found his efforts to dam the natural and peaceful inclinations of the people with prohibition statutes. The prohibitionists would endure for a time and then be swept away as the people went to the other extreme in defiance of all law.

We are beginning to see the same effect from the Volstead law, where men of all professions and social standing are defying this drastic prohibition law, and there is a decreasing respect for all law enacted by Congress.

The bigness of the task was illustrated by the commissioner's appeal to the clergy to assist him by reporting violations of the law in their congregations. But the clergy accepted this invitation requesting them to use their positions as religious teachers to spy upon their parishioners as an insult. It was suggesting a new rôle for the ministers of the gospel, even assuming that they were all prohibitionists, which they are not.

The Puritans who once controlled the Commonwealth of Massachusetts were strong on "Thou shalt not," but they did not apply it to ale or beer or even rum; and one of the old Puritan laws provided that tavern keepers should always provide good and wholesome beer for the entertainment of strangers; and another provided that the tavern should be located near to the meeting house, so that the congregation in winter could find something to take the blueness out of their noses after sitting for two hours in a cold meeting house listening to a dull sermon. [Laughter.]

I have here the bill of the pastor of the Old North Church of Boston, the church of Increase and Cotton Mather, in 1722. Let me read it to show you how the Puritans would have repudiated the act of our friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], or any other law fixing a percentage on their food and drink:

To be sent to Mr. Townsend's (for ministers entertained there), one plum cake, one Cheser cheese, one-half barrell beer, two bread bricks, one-half dozen Canary wine, two pounds fresh butter, one-half barrel ale.

From the cook shops: Three small pattyes, 12 dozen tarts.

To boil: Five hams bacon, 5 leggs porke, 15 meat tongues, 2 dozen fowles.

To rost: Five pieces beefe, five loins of veal, five qurs. lamb.

All sorts of sauce, as anchovies, pickles, greens, sallets, sparrow grass, oysters, onions, cramberrys.

Forty lbs. butter, eggs, one-quarter hund. reasons, one-quarter do. curants, spice of all sorts, 16 pudings.

Lickquer: One bl. beere, 1 bl. cyder, ¼ cask Madeira wine, ¼ hundred powder sugar, 1 loaf refine do., 1 galloon vinegar, ¼ galloon lim juice. Forty bread bricks; pips and tobacco; 1 doz. drinking glasses.

I do not refer to this little matter with any intention of disrespect to men and generations that played big parts in the early life and history of our country. I want you to know about these things, and I pray that you think them over. You will find no reference there to one-half of 1 per cent. I confess I am not a Puritan, or the descendant of Puritans, but I am constrained to defend the Puritan against the fanatical prohibitionists who pride themselves on being Puritans. The old boys never indulged in delusions about a beverage containing less than one-half of 1 per cent. [Laughter.] Although they tried at times to suppress every other form of personal liberty by law, the absurdity and stupidity of dictating what their fellows should drink and not drink seems never to have occurred to them. That brilliant stroke was left for the Anti-Saloon League and its representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Do you know, my colleagues, that among the Anglo-Saxons a man who advocated a new law did so with a rope around his neck, thus signifying his willingness to die should it turn out a failure? [Laughter.] Some students of present legislative tendencies have ironically suggested a revival of this ancient custom, to check one of the greatest evils confronting American civilization—the multiplicity of laws which are clogging the wheels of justice, fostering a contempt for the true spirit of law, and fast reducing the American people to a condition of law-ridden vassalage.

I say to you who supported this law that you have sown to the winds and that you will reap the whirlwinds. This law will, at one time or another, be the subject of controversy in every congressional district, for the American people are not ready to have their daily actions and their appetites regulated by law and the subject of spying. You know I speak the truth now that you have the law, even if you doubted it when you were passing the law. That law contemptuously thrust aside all principles of self-control—it reckons as nothing the influences of education, experience, and moral suasion. You have declared that the individual has no inherent rights which are bound to be respected, and I say to you that therein lies the real danger to our free institutions. Do not forget that coercion never yet made for the upward swing of the race.

Those two great party leaders, Uncle JOE CANNON and CHAMP CLARK, whom we all honor and love [applause], have told us in season and out of season that this is a Government through parties, and always will be while it remains a Government of the people. And yet while we were engaged in the World War against Prussianism, with 2,000,000 of our American boys in France fighting that monster of modern military imperialism, Congress without any commission from the people, without any party platform indorsed by the 20,000,000 Republican and Democratic voters of this country, put over the Volstead law by a bipartisan vote on this floor. The majority behind that act took refuge behind a bipartisan combination, in a political shell hole between the lines, a political maneuver which I have been taught represents political cowardice, if not political trickery.

In 1916, William J. Bryan, the apostle of grape juice, protested against making prohibition an issue in that great presidential campaign. He wished the Democratic Party to confine its declarations to policies of economy and international relations, and he did not want prohibition, either as a moral or political issue, injected into the campaign. Other prohibition leaders agreed with Mr. Bryan and the only party that made any declaration on this question was that which is here represented by one man, the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL], alone in his power. [Laughter.]

Prohibition was not a political issue by the voice of either of the great parties engaged in the contest for the presidency and the control of Congress; but while our boys were in France fighting Prussianism and sending home appeals for more modern guns, more aeroplanes, more ammunition, and more ships to carry more men over the sea to lick the Kaiser, we here in Congress, by a bipartisan vote, submitted to the State legislatures that had already been elected on other issues, the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution—the most Prussian policy of imperial Verboten that ever found lodgment on American soil. We followed that with all sorts of war-time prohibitions "to win the war," as though we were doing the fighting instead of the men in France, where wine and beer were served as rations.

Then, to cap the climax of absurd bipartisan politics, we passed the Volstead Act with its half of one per cent limitation on beverages, prohibition of household recipes that have made America famous as the land of good cooking and good living. You did not forget to place under suspicion and espionage every tea kettle, stew pan, and all other kitchen utensils that might be accused of brewing something containing more than one-half of one per cent of alcohol, which is the product of the sugar in the milk of every mother of the animal kingdom to sustain their young, and every sap that flows in every fruit, vegetable, shrub, or tree that grows.

You have prohibited the products of sugar formed by nature and you have quadrupled the price of the product of the Sugar Trust, permitting that well-known philanthropic corporation to gather into its coffers the billions we were accused of recklessiy wasting on drink. I have often heard that the sugar barrel attracted all kinds of flies, and that the Sugar Trust has followed that example and always appealed to bipartisan combinations in Congress for legislation which it desired for the reform of the world. It has never been partisan in its support of Congressmen or policies and has never been suspected of partisan appeal for legislation; and I wonder how much the Sugar Trust had to do with this bipartisan prohibition legislation to give it a monopoly in administering to the sweet tooth of Uncle Sam.

But, gentlemen, you have not settled this question which you carefully kept out of your platforms and campaigns for election. You have not kept it out of politics by injecting it into national legislation by bipartisan votes. You have injected it into national politics at a time when it may decide the presidential election and the majority of this Congress. And you can not prevent it because you have enacted the most un-American law that was ever put upon the statutes, and the American voters of both sexes will soon exercise their individual responsibility in reviewing your work as their Representatives. The ancient character who tried to sweep back the tides of the ocean was no more a success than you will be in trying to convince the American people that the liquor question has been taken out of politics and is beyond their jurisdiction. Why, it is just beginning, and I pray my friends in Congress that they watch out! [Great applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may proceed for 10 minutes on a matter of interest to the farmers.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from New York 10 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, on the 23d ultimo this House passed a resolution which I desire to read:

Resolved, etc., That in order to meet the existing emergency in the shortage of fertilizers the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell for cash at the prevailing market price, at the time of the sale thereof, to such distributors or users thereof, in the United States, as shall request the same, and in such quantity to each, not less than 1 ton nor more than 100 tons to any purchaser, as he shall see fit, not to exceed in the aggregate 100,000 tons of nitrate of soda, now held as a reserve supply of the War Department, the proceeds of such sale to be repaid to the proper item of the current appropriations originally made for such purposes: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress not later than December 6, 1920, the names of all purchasers of said nitrate of soda, together with the prices for which sold.

That was approved on the 23d of April. As soon as it was approved I wrote the Secretary of War urging that disposition be made of this nitrate of soda. That letter was dated the 28th or 29th day of April. I did not go to see the Secretary myself, but Senator CALDER and Representative MOTT of my State had their secretaries go to see the proper person who had charge of the carrying out of this resolution, and I want to relate to you what was said to them in response to their application to have prompt action upon this measure for the relief of the farmers of this Nation.

There never has been brought to my attention such an effort to find ways not to do a thing. In the first place, Mr. Schultz, of the Ordnance Department, who has charge of this matter, informed the two gentlemen who called upon him that the War Department had no power to declare this 100,000 tons of nitrate of soda "surplus," and that therefore they could not make the distribution. Well, nobody contemplated that they should make any such declaration. The resolution in express terms says that this 100,000 tons is part of the quantity which the War Department is holding as a "reserve" supply, so that they were under no obligation to reach such a result through such a mental operation, and all they had to do in the War Department was to read the resolution, which is only about eight lines long, in order to see what it did contain.

Having thus primarily placed themselves on the basis of not wanting to comply with what Congress had ordered them to do, they proceeded to show why they could not do it, and they said first, so far as the State of New York was concerned, which Senator CALDER and Mr. MOTT were speaking for—so far as that great Commonwealth was concerned—they said that there were stored in the depot at Schenectady from 6,000 to 10,000 tons of this material—nitrate of soda—but they said they could not distribute it. Why? What was the first great reason given by the department?

They said they had read the debates in the Senate, and that they had concluded from reading those debates that the Senators contemplated that the distribution should be made from "expensive" warehouses instead of being made from arsenals or depots. There is not any such expression in the resolution. There are no such terms or conditions in the resolution. These gentlemen are bound not by what some man may have said in the freeness and looseness of debate, but they are bound by the resolution itself.

Second, if you want to distribute as they think the talk indicated instead of the resolution by which they are bound, it was easy enough to find out a way to do it. They could distribute primarily from the arsenal or depot and then ship from the "expensive" warehouses where they were paying rent. Next, they say this quantity stored at Watervliet would have to be rebagged because it had eaten holes in the present bags. Of course, that is an objection that will always exist. It does not exist to-day any more than it will to-morrow. It does not exist this year any more than it will next year. It will always exist until they are rebagged.

Next, they said that they had great trouble in determining upon the price. They could not tell at what price they should sell; that they did not know what the price would be in the future; that apparently the resolution meant that they should buy a quantity in the future equal to the quantity they distributed now. Of course, there is no such thing in the resolution. The resolution in express terms says they are to sell at the market price as it is to-day, and all it says about the future is that the sums they realize are to be put to the credit of the original appropriation which was made for the production of this material. And then when they come to the question of distribution, they say that they think the best way to distribute it would be to select the three great importing houses in the country and turn it over to them with the agreement that they would deliver back at any time in the future when they demand it an equal amount to that which they now obtain. Did you ever hear of such a way of carrying out the wishes of Congress?

Here is a product in a natural state, produced only abroad, which must be imported, and these gentlemen who are to carry out the wishes of Congress to relieve the wants of the farmers and give them the product at a moderate price so that the agricultural product of the country may be increased, propose to do what? They propose to place the 100,000 tons of nitrate of soda in the hands of the only competitors of the Government in sales in order that the price may be absolutely controlled by the importers. Then these gentlemen said even this method of distribution was not perfect, because the department might be charged with "favoritism." And well he might entertain that fear, for if there ever was a scheme, if there was a plan to defeat the honest and beneficent wishes of Congress, if there ever was a plan to frustrate a movement to give the farmers a cheap fertilizer, this plan evolved by these men is the cleverest that could by any stretch of the imagination be devised or even conceived.

This gentleman says finally that he is afraid, owing to these various imaginings of his, owing to these troubles that he has built up out of his fertile brain, owing to the bogies which have no existence except as he sees them in his dreams, owing to all these things, the distribution could not be made in time for the farmer for the present year.

Now, gentlemen, it is late, but the season is late also, and with three weeks beyond the usual time, there is time enough for this distribution to be made for the benefit of the farmers of the country. They never have confronted the difficulties in which they find themselves involved this year—shortage of help, increased prices of everything they use, all sorts of difficulties which meet the farmer. We plan this small measure of relief, easily extended, which can be simply and naturally executed. How can it be done? Find out what the price is and sell it at the market price, just exactly as the resolution declares. How can it be distributed? Get in communication with the agricultural departments of the various States and turn this material over to them or such farmers' organizations as they recommend. It is easily and simply done. There is nothing difficult about it, nothing that requires thought; all it requires is prompt and immediate action in order that this distribution may take place in time. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the many discussions on the high cost of living, both in and out of Congress. I thought I would use the time allotted to me to-day in giving my views on this important subject. In my judgment, the six factors which more than others have brought about in this country the high cost of living are:

First. The urgency of the world's demand for our raw materials and manufactured articles during and since the war.

Second. Lessened production.

Third. Lack of transportation facilities and markets for our perishable crops.

Fourth. Inflation of our currency and credit.

Fifth. Profiteering.

Sixth. Governmental extravagance, private extravagance, and taxation.

First, let us consider the urgency of the world's demand for our raw materials and manufactured articles during and since the war and lessened production. We know that upon the declaration of war millions of men were taken suddenly from farms, factories, mines, and forests, and were put into the military service; and millions more of those at home were compelled to change from normal production to the production of munitions of war and other supplies necessary to the men in the active military service. We know, too, that beginning before the war, during the war, and since the war there has been a world movement from the farms to the already congested centers. I am sure all will admit that these conditions brought about increased demand for our raw materials and manufactured products and lessened production, and that, of course, constitutes the main factors in the high cost of living. Now, what is the remedy for this situation? The remedy is more work and more production.

But, my friends, it is very easy for one to suggest a remedy here, when he says "work and increase production," but there are certain conditions prevailing that must be understood and solved before we can get good and permanent results. To begin with, there must be a better understanding between capital, labor, and the public. All must understand that capital is necessary to develop and operate the industries of the country, and that in order to get capital it must receive a fair return on its legitimate investments, and it must have the protection of the law in its legitimate operations. All must understand that efficient and steady labor is necessary in order to increase production and in order to have efficient and steady labor, labor must receive fair and just wages so as to keep up the American standard of living. We must understand, too, that the unorganized public is entitled to a fair and just treatment at the hands of both organized capital and organized labor. The demagogue and radical agitator who sows discord between organized capital and organized labor, especially during our period of reconstruction when we are readjusting ourselves to new conditions, is an enemy of society and good government and should be dealt with accordingly. His only object is to stir up strife and inflame hatred and widen the distance between employers and employees in the hope of arousing such passion as to precipitate widespread conflict. His desire is not to encourage people to work and produce but to encourage a certain element to loot the stored-up wealth of the country. These radical agitators are committing a crime against the existence of the United States, and they should be punished severely. The interests of organized capital and organized labor are bound up with the interests of the public as a whole, and the interests of all are bound together in the interests of the Nation. It is impossible to separate the interests of any class or any association. Mutual consideration is not only a manifestation of Christian spirit but of good business. We have various industries and undeveloped resources in this country, and we must encourage capital, labor, and genius if we wish to encourage our industries and develop our resources and increase production and make it possible for the people to find employment and be happy and contented and prosperous.

When we take into consideration the facts brought out by the Federal Trade Board recently that food absorbs 38.2 per cent of the average American household's income, it should be evident to every thinking man that the shortage of foodstuffs is one of the most serious problems we have to contend with at this time. Here again let me call your attention to certain conditions existing in our agricultural sections which must be understood and remedied if we really wish to increase production. The farmers always need some financial assistance because of the high prices for seed, labor, and machine power. The Federal Farm Loan Board can do a great deal to relieve this situation, and the system should be perfected as rapidly as possible so as to finally reach the individual that it is intended to relieve, provided of course that his demands are reasonable and safe to the Government. But some of the farmers' needs are sudden, especially during the planting and harvesting season. These short-time needs must be met by a quick mobilization of money. Much new land will be worked if this is done in time, especially in the sections where the crops were short. Then, too, we must encourage the men and women who remain on the farm and who till the soil, and we must give them an opportunity to own it. This is the foundation stone upon which alone can be builded an attractive country life. The small farm owned by the man who works it is the best plant bed on which to grow strong men and women. A landless population will always make a Mexico or a Russia, but the strong citizen standing in the doorway of his own home is himself the builder and advocator of the commonwealth. Oratory has tried to reverse the current from the country to the city, but the cry of "back to the farm" will continue to fall on deaf ears unless something is done to make living in the country more attractive and profitable. Long ago it became evident to the wise statesmen and economists of the leading European countries that the soil worn out by centuries of use and abuse needs reclamation and improvement in order to produce the best results, not only to make agriculture profitable to the individual farmer but especially to enable each rival country to produce the products of the soil at a cost to permit that country to compete with other rivals in the markets of the world. This need led to the birth of the rural credit system in Europe, separate and different from the other banking system. We likewise have discovered the necessity of creating a Federal farm loan system. Let every citizen, whether he lives in the city or in the country, study this system with the view of perfecting it as a means of building up our country, because, after all, we are an agricultural nation. We should bear in mind also that the farmers' work is very hard at times and that their hours of work are long, and that, therefore, they must derive enough profits from the soil to pay taxes, build up comfortable homes, drain their land, build good roads, better schools, and better churches.

Right in this connection let me say a word to my good friends from the East and North who represent congested districts. You often complain about the high prices farmers are receiving for their products and advocate measures to reduce these prices in order to lower the cost of living to your constituents. I say to you that if you wish to be sincere and effective and do something for your people, make it plain to them that the only way that production can be increased is to give the farmers fair prices for what they produce, and see to it that some of your middlemen do not make the excessive profits that they are making at this very time.

Another important need in the country is more liberal appropriations for agricultural colleges and agricultural high schools. If we are to conserve our soil and make it produce more, it is absolutely necessary that our people be taught scientific and practical agriculture, so that a love for agriculture as a science will be created—the same as the love for any other science. Unfortunately we have permitted agriculture to be looked upon as an undignified profession when it should be considered one of the main ones, for it is the foundation for the success of the men engaged in all the other professions, such as law, medicine, and commerce.

Washington, the "Father of his country" and the "Farmer of Mount Vernon," said:

I know of no pursuit in which more real and important service can be rendered to any country than by improving agriculture.

Daniel Webster said:

Farmers are the foundation of civilization and prosperity. A farmer must always be the foundation, but that does not mean that he must be kept beneath the surface.

Why has agriculture been slow in taking its place as a science throughout the country? My observation has been that too many of the teachers lack practical experience and fail to make a success on their little experimental farms as a result of it. That, of course, reflects on scientific agriculture. The cause for this is that they are instructed in agricultural colleges where they have not sufficient facility to teach the practical side of it on experimental farms in connection with the college course. The experimental farm is to the agricultural college what the hospital is to the medical college.

Another matter that deserves consideration in our efforts to better the condition of country life and increase production is sanitation. Did it ever occur to you, gentlemen of the House, how much time and money—not to mention suffering—is lost as a result of diseases that could be prevented by the simple application of the scientific knowledge we already have? We have stamped out, for instance, yellow fever, bubonic plague, smallpox, and cholera. Why not go further and stamp out malaria and typhoid fever, the two most serious diseases we have to contend with all the time? We know the causes of these diseases and how they are transmitted and how to prevent them. It is merely a question of cooperation between local and Federal Governments and working in harmony. The safeguarding of the health of the worker in every kind of work that yields a profit or confers a benefit should be a matter of primary consideration.

I repeat that before we can reverse the current back to the farm or even arrest the current from the farm to the cities and increase production of agricultural products it is necessary that we deal with these conditions that I have just mentioned and improve them. Pause and think how serious the situation is when we consider the fact that in the beginning of our country about 10 per cent of the people lived in the towns and cities, and to-day over 50 per cent of our population have left the farms. No wonder the cry, "A house, a house; my kingdom for a house," is the cry in every city of the United States, and "Help, help; my crop is rotting in the field for the lack of labor," is the cry on every farm in every section of the country.

I now come to the third factor, lack of transportation facilities and markets for our perishable crops.

Anyone who has lived on a farm knows that the delay in hauling and marketing the products of the farm is the cause of heavy loss to the producer, which in time is bound to be reflected in higher prices to the consumer.

When I speak of better transportation facilities I have in mind a comprehensive system of transportation, which includes good roads, railways, and waterways, so that our agricultural products, and especially the perishable products, when ready for market, can be shipped from the producer to the consumer without delay. When these products reach the large centers they should find markets at once. Inefficient and uneconomical wholesale marketing facilities are held by the Federal Trade Commission to be in a large measure responsible for the high cost of living. A recent investigation conducted by the commission in different cities throughout the country convinces the commission that improving marketing facilities at the great consuming centers would prove a long step toward the lowering of present-day living cost. This report relates particularly to wholesaling and contemplates the elimination of waste as well as securing a more direct relation between the producer and the consumer. Careless handling, improperly equipped cars, delays in moving, and exposure while perishable products are in railway transit to markets are stated to be the causes of much and unnecessary losses and expense to dealers and shippers. The report also shows that buildings and other facilities for the marketing of perishable products in a majority of wholesale receiving centers are not adequate and badly located, and markets are not convenient to terminals, storage, and retail, thus necessitating a large amount of cartage. In fact, the whole distributing system is said to be wasteful and inefficient. It is now to be hoped that the Federal Trade Commission will make a thorough inquiry into the retail distribution of foods and see how the wide margins on food prices may be reduced.

We will never have a comprehensive system of transportation in this country until our people realize the importance of connecting the local communities and States by good roads. In the past the impression was that good roads were needed by those who used automobiles only. To-day we know that good roads are absolutely necessary and of great benefit to all the people. The farmers are taking a greater interest in good roads to-day than ever before, because they realize that their success depends on diversification, and that nothing makes diversification more profitable than quick and easy transportation.

With the good roads we are beginning to see that good roads also mean motor trucks. With motor trucks it is easier and cheaper for the producers to ship what they produce to the consumers, and it also makes it easier to secure what they need from the merchants. Then, too, with the congestion in railroad traffic, unrest, and many strikes, we are beginning to realize that the motor trucks are absolutely necessary to the people in the large centers. For instance, in the recent tie-up, when there was almost complete paralysis of railroad transportation, it was the Government and private-owned trucks that saved the situation and prevented suffering and starvation in the large centers.

I never appreciated the real value of good roads until I visited Europe last year. Take, for instance, France. As we all know, the French people are very economical, and long ago they understood the value of good roads and have the most wonderful system of public roads in the world. It is said, and I have no doubt it is true, that it was the good roads of France that saved her in the last crisis, because when the railroad transportation was blocked people and commodities were moved from place to place on their good roads without a particle of trouble.

Then, too, in order to increase production and lower the high cost of living in this country we should adopt a systematic method of improving and using our waterways. While we are building an American merchant marine under the American flag to carry the products of our farms, forests, mines, and factories from our seaboards to the markets of the world we must not neglect to improve our inland shipping. We have the most magnificent system of waterways in the world, and if we adopt a comprehensive and systematic policy of improving our waterways it will not only relieve the congestion of traffic on our railroads but it will give us lower freight rates. The bulky stuff could go by water and the balance of our trade could move by rail. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Chief of the War Department's Transportation Service and Director of Inland Waterways, in an address to New Orleans business representatives a few days ago, said:

> Operation of waterways should not be looked upon by the railroads as competition, but as cooperation. The railroads are unprepared to handle the commerce of the country to-day. They and the commerce and business of the country, upon which they depend, must look to the waterways for help.

In connection with the improvement of our waterways we should build better terminal facilities, so that freight could be handled, going and coming, without damage done to it.

Then, too, our people should take advantage of the existing warehouse law, organize under it, and provide better warehousing facilities for our agricultural products. Take, for instance, cotton and rice as it is now; a good deal of it is left in the open, exposed to the elements and without insurance, the loss, of course, falling on the producer. With warehouses all over the agricultural sections, the farmers could store their cotton and rice where it could be protected against bad weather, weighed, and graded by experts, who are neither buyers nor sellers, and insured at a reasonable rate. Then the farmers, with their cotton and rice receipts, would not only be safe from loss, but they could use these receipts as money in their business transactions.

The fourth factor to which I want to call your attention is the increased volume of money; in other words, inflation.

Of course, we all understand that war made our expenses very heavy. Not only that the Government spent its cash but it borrowed money from the people. For instance, if we read a daily statement of the United States Treasurer which reads as follows: "Outstanding Federal notes, $3,000,000,000," against which there is in gold and lawful money $1,000,000,000, and we subtract one from the other, we will find two billions based upon credit. The more paper money issued in this way the cheaper the money. That, of course, is one of the elements that enters in high prices. The per capita money in the United States has recently increased from $34 to $54, but the purchasing power of the dollar has dropped to about 50 cents. Expanding this credit is like inflating a balloon. It will not expand indefinitely. History teaches us that the nation that has failed to read this warning in the past has suffered for it. We should not forget the panic in 1873, brought about by the Civil War.

There has been some criticism of the Federal reserve bank system in this connection. For instance, Representative KING charged that 75 per cent of the high cost of living was due to the financing of speculators and hoarders by the Federal reserve system. Mr. Marcus Walker, of the Federal reserve bank in New Orleans, says:

> The Federal reserve banks have the unfortunate distinction of being in a position where they get criticism both going and coming—from member banks on the one hand and from the public on the other.

There is no doubt but that the Federal reserve banks are in a position to cut down inflation quickly if they want to do so. All that would be necessary would be a refusal to discount loans from member banks. The member banks would then have to refuse loans to their customers and inflation would most certainly come to a stop. But at the same time the bottom would drop out of business and the Federal reserve bank would be in line for some real criticism then.

Squeezing down on credit, limiting loans to legitimate business needs—that is the sane, orderly way to reduce inflation.

And that is what is being done more and more daily. The Federal reserve banks are scrutinizing their loans closely. The individual member banks are doing the same. And especially since the increase in the Federal reserve banks' discount rate, the merchant also is giving his loans greater thought and is trying more and more to hold them down.

This matter will probably be investigated.

There is no "cure all" which will prove a magic remedy for inflation. The cure rests with us. The individual must work, produce, and save, and the Government must also economize so as to reduce its debts and the running expense of government. This has been emphasized by some of the best-informed students of finance and economics. Secretary of the Treasury Glass, in a recent letter to the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, said:

The process of getting back to normal must necessarily be slow, involving as it does not only the physical restoration of industry and agriculture, but as well the restoration to habits in industry of masses of men, accustomed by the war to unsettlement. We must necessarily, and to a great extent, depend upon and encourage the independent activity and resourcefulness of each person affected to repair his own fortunes, with the assistance of his business connections, and also upon each individual to return to a normal life of industry and economy.

Mr. Paul M. Warburg, former member of the Federal Reserve Board, and one of the highest authorities on finance, said:

We are living in an era where the production of money and credits has increased and the production of goods has decreased. In order to emerge, we must produce less credit and money and produce more goods. In practically all leading countries the people have been urged in the strongest possible manner to produce more and to consume less.

The National Board of Farm Organization, in its recent memorial to Congress, under the title of "Adequate Production," displays a keen appreciation of the situation by saying:

The farmers of the United States are continuing their best efforts to produce abundant foodstuffs, and contending that production in the factories, mines, and mills is second in importance only to that of the farm, they demand of both labor and capital that they, too, shall earnestly and consistently speed up their part of the production so urgently needed.

I could quote you more warnings from deep students of finance and economics, but it is useless to do so because the opinion of all is the same and leads to identically the same conclusions. In the face of earnest admonitions to economize the people are wasteful and extravagant. In response to pleas for thrift, a wave of speculation is sweeping the country, and Liberty bonds are being exchanged for stock in wild-cat schemes. Let us hope that our people will wake up in time, realize the danger ahead, and apply the remedy it has within its own hands. The facts can not be winked at, for they are cold, hard, practical facts of human experience, and they point to perils which can be seen ahead and which must be avoided. I have an abiding faith in the good sense of the American people, and I feel sure that they will awaken in time to avoid disaster and will lead the march of the country back to sanity and reason.

I now come to the fifth factor in the high cost of living—the unscrupulous profiteers, who take advantage of just such a situation as exists to-day, when production is low and the demand great, to ask abnormally large prices from the consumer for products which they have obtained much cheaper.

I am glad to know that the Department of Justice has been given sufficient appropriation and power under the law to deal with the profiteers, and I hope that they will be prosecuted and punished to the full extent of the law. But we might as well realize right now that fines will never curb them, and that the only way to stop them is to give them jail sentences.

As high as the cost of living now is, there is no doubt that it would be higher still if the power of the Government was not being exerted against those who are exploiting the people for their personal gain. At the same time we should follow the advice of Royal Meeker, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, in which he wisely points out the necessity of increasing production and in that way remove the field of temptation for the profiteers.

The sixth factor in the high cost of living, Government extravagance, private extravagance, and taxation, must be considered together.

It is very evident to one who has studied our system of government that we are constantly drifting away from the Jeffersonian idea of government and drifting toward centralization of power at Washington.

Now, any experienced student of economics should understand that the further the Government is removed away from the people the more extravagant it becomes. Individuals far removed from the Treasury are constantly making demands for appropriations, forgetting that every dollar in the Federal Treasury comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers. Then, too, when the Government is far removed from the people, too much of the money appropriated by the Government is wasted before it is finally applied where it is needed.

Of course, in discussing Government and private extravagance we must not forget that there is such a thing as legitimate increase in cost of both Government and private affairs, because of the difference in the standard of living. For instance, a good many years ago, when I began to practice medicine in the country, my patients would send for me by messenger, and I went to see them in a buggy over bad roads. To-day, in the same community, the patient calls the physician by telephone and expects him to answer the call immediately in his machine, which, of course, necessitates a good road. Now, the cost of a telephone system, the machine, and the good road, which were looked upon a few years ago as a luxury, are now regarded as necessities, and therefore a necessary increase in the cost of living. This I will call a legitimate increase. On the other hand, if as a result of lack of interest on the part of the people in the community in their Government $2 is appropriated where $1 would answer the purpose in the building and maintenance of that good road, that, of course, is extravagance and waste and an unnecessary expense to the people.

Now, let us take an example of an individual case in the city. Years ago the housewife would go to the corner grocer with her tin bucket for a pound of butter, which was dished out of the grocer's tub and she carried it home herself. To-day, in order to save time, she phones her grocer for a pound of butter, and the grocer sends it to her by a delivery man, the butter being wrapped in sanitary paper. This, of course, is a legitimate increase in the cost of living, and no one can find fault with it. However, if 2 pounds of butter are ordered and the family can manage on 1 and the balance goes into the garbage can, that is waste and quite a factor in the high cost of living.

I mention these two cases to illustrate the line of demarcation between a legitimate increase and waste, both in the life of the individual and the Government.

If we are to remedy this situation we must begin by pushing aside our loose way of doing business and adopt the budget system. The Government, National, State, county, or municipal, must, like the individual, live within its income, and this can only be accomplished by adopting the budget system, which would eliminate duplication of estimates and unnecessary appropriations and waste of money after it has been appropriated.

The people throughout the country do not object to necessary appropriations for worthy purposes, such as schools, drainage, good roads, agriculture, and so forth, but they do insist that the money raised by taxation for this purpose should be collected in a simpler way, at less expense, and spent more carefully, so that they will get value received when the work is done. A private business could not be run under such a loose system as we have in Government without going into bankruptcy.

Our method of collecting our taxes is too complicated and too costly. I believe it would be wise for the Government to appoint a nonpolitical body of experts to study the various methods of taxation and report to Congress. Then I believe it would be possible for Congress to legislate on this matter in an intelligent way. In England a committee of nonpolitical experts was recently appointed by the Government to study the various kinds of taxation which have been in force during the past five years and to make a report to Parliament, based on such study. Why should we not make an attempt to find a simpler and less extensive system of raising the money necessary to run the Government? It seems to me, too, that there should be a systematic effort on the part of the Government to teach economy. At present we have no governmentally appointed body here charged specifically with this work, such as they have in France. And France has demonstrated that thrift is a national asset of the greatest value.

The people must not be deceived and led to expect a return to normal conditions too quickly. We should discourage demagogues who go about in the land advocating a quick cure for every ill we have and who lead some people to believe that everything can be corrected by the enactment of laws only. It is wrong because it is false, and because it tends to foment a spirit of unrest and dissatisfaction among a certain element of the public and make them ripe for the inculcation of seditious teachings by the radical agents of the soviets. What we need is to get back to fundamental principles and study our problems in the light of reason and common sense, with a view of finding the causes so that we can apply intelligent and permanent remedies. By working together and in harmony, we can solve these problems in the right way, and we can do it under the system of government left to us by the fathers of our country. I do not believe that there ever was built by man a more magnificent form of government than that wonderful instrument we hear so little about these days—the Constitution of the United States, provided every person under it is willing to do his full duty, and provided he is willing to labor and deserve success. That instrument is the foundation of your liberty, of mine, and the liberty of all the people. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, Grecian mythology is filled with beautiful thoughts and teaches great fundamental truths. It gives to the forces of nature a name and a character. It clothes great scientific principles with romance and beauty. Heat and cold, wind and storm, land and sea, sun and moon, planets and stars and all the material world and the physical forces of nature are given a personality and character. Love and hate, strength and weakness, happiness and misery, truth and falsehood and all the virtues of mind and heart, as well as all bodily strength and weakness, are represented by some being, good or bad, constantly warring with each other for the weal or woe of mankind.

We of this practical age can learn many wholesome lessons by a study and understanding of this beautiful system of Grecian philosophy. Of all things, the Greek was a practical philosopher, and as long as his people lived up to this practical philosophy they were a great and a prosperous people. But she got too rich. She was given to great games, not for the prime purpose of making strong their bodies but for the sole purpose of furnishing amusement. Their lives were given over to pleasure and luxury. Above all things, she forgot the fundamental lesson of Antæus.

Antæus was the son of Poseidon and Ge, or better known as "Neptune" and the "Earth," or sea and land. Antæus became a mighty giant and wrestler of Libya. His strength was invincible so long as he remained in contact with his mother, the Earth. She gave him strength and never allowed him to be overcome. All strangers who came to his country were compelled to wrestle with him. The conquered were slain, and out of their skulls he built a temple to Neptune, which became Neptune's home upon the land. Hercules heard of this mighty giant, and through the jealousy of some mythological woman found out the secret of his strength. He went into Antæus's country and, catching him off his guard, lifted him from the earth and crushed him in the air after a terrible struggle. It is from this story that we get the expression "Always keep your feet upon the ground."

This lesson of Antæus I would have Uncle Sam to learn. After learning it I would have him never for a moment to forget and be off his guard, but to always remember and keep his feet upon the ground. If he will do this, his mother earth will always give him strength and power and he will be able to resist his most powerful enemies, come from whatever quarter of the globe they may.

If he forgets the source of his strength and sustenance and neglects to stay close to mother earth, some Hercules of hunger will arise in his midst and, finding Uncle Sam's feet off the earth, will crush him to death, and Columbia, the fairest daughter of all time, will be ravished and torn by this beast Hercules and die a death of shame and degradation.

Mr. Chairman, one great problem, the one to which I would summon the highest endeavor not only of every Member of this Congress but of every American citizen to solve correctly, is the great question of so reconstructing our affairs in America that our strongest, wisest, and best people may find it to be not simply their duty but their pleasure, happiness, and contentment to cultivate the soil. When man was driven from the Garden of Eden, it was decreed that he should earn his daily bread by the sweat of his face. This is the immutable law of nature. The soil, however fertile, will not produce sustenance for man without cultivation. As an academic question, every sane man admits this. As a practicable proposition, the majority of our own people seem to overlook this truth. We are prone to put our thumbs in our vest holes and with assurance say "we are a practical people." Our orators will with great eloquence proclaim, "We are harnessing the forces of nature and requiring them to do our bidding. We are chaining the lightning of heaven and directing its powerful force to turn the wheels of our commerce and convey our messages to all the distant quarters of the globe in the twinkling of an eye. Our cities are marvels of busy commerce and trade. Look at the mighty piles of brick and mortar, towering amid the vaulted heavens, filled with teeming millions of busy people. See our great factories, with their belching smokestacks blackening the sky, and hear the humming of millions of spindles and clicking looms. Contemplate the glare of our furnaces converting the dead, cold rocks into living steel. Hear our locomotives thundering over hills and across our blossoming prairies and through our mountain ranges, eliminating the distance between our oceans," and so forth.

His picture is beautiful and his eloquence receives the applause of a proud and admiring people. All of this is as it should be. But does he in talking so eloquently of all this evidence of power and strength in our great Republic impress upon the minds of his people that there is something more important than all this; that all the power and strength in these institutions are based upon something else? Has he not forgotten the lesson of Antæus? Does he not know and should he not constantly keep in the minds of all the people of all these mighty cities that the very life of all this marvelous manufacturing and commercial enterprise comes from the cultivation of the soil?

Let us never forget as a people this lesson of Grecian mythology. If we do, we will harness in vain the forces of nature. The lightning will turn no more wheels of commerce and convey no more messages. Our cities, now marvels of beauty, will become charnel houses of death, the music of our spindles will no longer charm the ear, and the scream of the locomotives will be heard no more in the land.

Mr. Chairman, the basis not only of our prosperity but of our very life as a nation depends upon the products of the soil. [Applause.] Our future as a nation is in the hands of the American farmer. [Applause.]

The greatest Republic that ever existed, save our own, was the Republic of Rome. It is a most interesting inquiry, and one that should be instructive—why art, literature, science, philosophy, learning, and great political organization did not prevent so mournful an eclipse of human glory as took place upon the fall of the majestic Empire of the Romans. There can be no question that civilization achieved most splendid triumphs and human liberty rose to heights never achieved by any people before them. What grandeur was theirs! Let your eyes be opened in your imagination as a contemporary upon this wonderful age. Your eyes would rest upon the beautiful and cultivated face of nature, on commerce and ships, on military successes and triumphs, on the glories of heroes and generals, on a subdued world, on a complicated mechanism of social life, on the blazing wonders of art, on sculptures and pictures, on temples and monuments which ornament every part of the Empire; and then you would reflect on the bright theories which their philosophy proposed, on the truths which were incorporated with the system of jurisprudence on which their wondrous constitution which the experience of ages had framed, on the genius of poets and historians; yea, on the whole system of social life, adorned with polished manners and the graces of great intellects. When you saw all this and how for centuries each generation had gradually progressed to such heights you would say, "Surely the reign of peace and prosperity will be perpetual."

Why, then, did they fail? Why did not their beautiful philosophy, their arts and sciences, their great statesmen, their great merchants, and their love of liberty save them? The answer is easy and certain.

In the early days of the Roman Republic the most honorable vocation of a Roman citizen was that of the "agricola." The cultivation of the soil was the most revered of all callings by the early Romans. We all know the beautiful story of old Cato. He led the Roman armies to great victories. As soon as the dangers were past he went back to the plow. Brumidi, the great artist who decorated our National Capitol, has two paintings which can be seen in the Post Office and Post Roads Committee rooms. On one side you see Cato being called from the plow to lead the Roman Army; on the other Israel Putnam to lead our Army. The artist here, in marvelous beauty, shows why the Roman Republic was great and why the American Republic is great.

But Rome became rich. She was given over to pleasure, the circus, the arena. In every city in Rome there was entertainment for the people at public expense. The farms were deserted. The sources of moral renovation were poisoned, the very means of culture were perverted, and "the savor unto life became a savor unto death." Only the least intellectual and those least given to enterprise remained in the country and on the farms.

In their primitive state they were brave, trusting, affectionate, enterprising, and given to the cultivation of the soil, and they made great strides in learning and in the sciences and arts. Her armies were invincible. But when they looked upon labor as dishonorable, and farming was no longer looked upon as an honorable vocation, the Goths and Vandals, the Hercules of the north of Europe, found Rome an easy prey, and she was overcome because she had forgotten the source of her strength and power. She ran the usual course of the nations which preceded her. The sterling virtues of her primitive times produced prosperity and material greatness because she encouraged and honored agriculture. But prosperity produced idleness, pride, and sensuality. The corruption spread. Society was undermined and arts fell with the people, except such as ministered to a corrupt taste, like demoralizing pictures and inflammatory music. Men in their wickedness were indifferent to truth and virtue. Good men had made good laws; bad men perverted them. Land was monopolized by the few, and those who were compelled to cultivate the soil were not permitted to enjoy the fruits of their labor. When the day of trial came, there was nothing that could save the Roman State. Her feet being off of Mother Earth, she had lost all of her power.

I pause here long enough to say that those who have visited Pompeii say that the pictures on the walls, while in every detail perfect, are so foul that even a man alone feels like leaving the horrible scene. This is a living evidence of the immorality among that great people who had built the most marvelous republic which was converted into the most marvelous empire which ever existed on the earth. Think of the countries now great whose territory was at one time all under the dominion of this mighty people. Is there not some lesson that we may learn from the study of this great people, so nearly like ourselves in their idea of liberty and in their ideas of conducting public affairs? You will all remember that when St. Paul was arrested and was about to be taken to the courts of Judea for trial, he exclaimed, "I am a Roman citizen and I appeal to Cæsar." That is all he had to do, and the shackles were stricken from his limbs. Why? Because the Roman people loved liberty so much that under her constitution a citizen of Rome could not be tried for his liberty or his life except by the Roman Senate. It was this appeal of St. Paul that carried the Christian religion to the shores of Europe.

The question of food is just as vital in one age as it is in another. No people can thrive without ample supplies of food. No nation ever long survived in any war unless not only her soldiers but her people had ample food.

Let us now apply this principle to modern nations. What was the cause of the failure of the Southern Confederacy? Was it not because she could not feed her armies and her people at home? Her ports were closed, and her people, being engaged in the production of cotton, suffered from hunger, and this was the principal cause of her failure. No one in the cause of the Union appreciated this more than did Abraham Lincoln. His common sense enabled him to see that by cutting the Confederacy in two by controlling the Mississippi River he would cut the South off from the food supply of the West, and he pursued this policy of surrounding the Confederate capital and the Confederate Army by restricting the territory from which they could obtain food.

In the late World War was not the lack of food the chief cause of the downfall of the great German Empire? No people recognize this fact more than do the Germans themselves. Was not this the cause of the submarine war? Was not this what drew us into that horrible conflict? Germany was making a desperate fight to starve England and France, and does anyone deny that she would have succeeded if she could have destroyed England's shipping, thus depriving England and France of food from America? So in the last analysis it was the American farmer that won this World War. [Applause.]

If I could, I would burn into the mind of every citizen of America that this Republic is no stronger than the American farmer. [Applause.] If he fails, then the Republic fails. If he prospers, then the Republic is prosperous.

Mr. Chairman, this, in my judgment, is the most critical moment in our history. Our whole social, business, and political life is in a state of change and revolution. Unrest and uncertainty are everywhere. New theories of government are being advanced. Many people are talking of overthrowing our Government. War is over and won and yet our problems have multiplied. The future is more uncertain than it ever was.

People are crowding into our cities. The farms are being deserted. Labor is demanding shorter hours, less labor, and more pay. Great fortunes have been made by the few. The breach between capital and labor has been widened. The rich are endeavoring to avoid the payment of taxes and are resisting the graduated income tax and are insisting upon the expenses of government being paid by the masses by placing a consumption tax on all that they use and on all that they need.

Individualism is being threatened with communism. Our nationalism is threatened with internationalism.

The present Congress seems powerless to comprehend and to deal with the situation.

No one can foresee what the result of the coming election will be.

Taxation instead of being reduced is being increased. Not a single war law or war measure has been repealed.

Remedies are being proposed which will only increase our burdens.

Petty party advantage is being sought, and the party in power in Congress seems utterly incapacitated to deal with the situation.

The daily press is filled with a crusade against the high cost of living and abuses Congress for not reducing it.

Now every eye is upon Congress, expecting it to do something because you have invited it, because you have promised more than you can perform. Congress is corrupting the minds of our people in so far as they can by the false idea that if the present Congress is kept in power they, by legislation, will bring prosperity—that is, present it to the people on some legislative platter. This idea has gone so far that every demagogue that runs for office endeavors to convince the people that he will have the Government do more for them if he is given office.

The Constitution is forgotten by these men in their thirst for office. Even men in Congress vote for and advocate measures that they believe are popular, and when asked, "Is it constitutional?" the reply is, "If it is not, the Supreme Court will so hold." They are thus "passing the buck," to use a modern slang expression. This is cowardly and unworthy of men who have taken a solemn oath not to violate but to uphold the Constitution. Is it any wonder that great numbers of our people lose confidence in the sanctity of that sacred instrument? Is it any wonder that we see socialism on the increase in our great cities? Is it any wonder that the radical element is on the increase?

Mr. Chairman, the outlook is gloomy. Every wise and patriotic citizen of the Government wants to know the cause of all this. Before we can find a remedy, we must know the cause. We must first diagnose the case.

The cause, in my judgment, is more easily found than the remedy. You ask, "What is it?" The unrest is due primarily to too much idleness and too little labor. [Applause.] "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." Busy men are not given to mischief. The man who would prosper without labor is the man who would live by his own wits on the labor of others. This is just as true of the labor agitator as it is of the market manipulator. Both care nothing for the public good. Of course, there are many men who are very rich who have the public good in mind, and many labor leaders who are patriotic and are simply striving to have labor fairly treated. But these are not the men doing the harm.

The majority of our laboring men are patriotic and desire to help the Government and would resist its destruction with as much energy as any other patriotic class. The vast majority of our people are sound and can be trusted if they are given the facts. I believe firmly in the capacity of the people to govern themselves. I believe that they, when the real test comes, will rise to the emergency and uphold the hands of the men who are striving for the right. This is our only hope. If this fails, the Republic is doomed. [Applause.]

Our public men must cease playing cheap politics and rise above the blinding mist and fog of self-interest. They must stand for the right though they lose office. They should follow no leader who does not embody their ideas of righteousness, truth, and justice. The party label should mean something else than who shall hold office. [Applause.] When political parties are struggling with each other for the control of the Government solely for the purpose of controlling the patronage and to serve some particular section, then the country suffers when either party wins. A party victory should mean a victory of great principles. When elected, the highest effort of those elected to office should be to serve the best interest of all the people of all sections. Those holding the office should administer it not for themselves and in their own interest but to see that they serve the best interest of all the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I shall say about the present House shall not be said in any party spirit nor in any spirit of personal criticism, but is intended to be purely impersonal.

What measures are pending that tend to relieve the present alarming situation?

HAMPER-BASKET BILL.

First and foremost on the calendar is offered the hamper-basket bill." Great stress has been placed upon this measure by its proponents. It is a measure of the majority in the House. What a great boon it will be to the ultimate consumer to have a "hamper" that conforms in every particular to the rigid requirements of the great Government! The farmer is guilty under this bill of a Federal offense if he offers for sale a gallon of beans or any other farm produce in any container other than the one described by law. What evil will it remedy? The farmer and truck grower will find himself in the toils of the criminal law if he offers his beans and potatoes in any but the Government-approved container, even though he can find no other and his customer is hungry.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT BILL.

Second is the retirement bill for the Federal employees. This is remedy No. 2 for our national ills. The already overburdened taxpayers will find upon their backs an additional burden. This bill is passed, I suppose, upon the idea that "unto everyone that hath shall be given and he shall have abundance, but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

A man who is favored with a Federal position is only required under this bill to work until he is 65 years of age; then he must retire with a pension. I wonder what Uncle JOE CANNON, Gen. SHERWOOD, Maj. STEDMAN, CHAMP CLARK, and many other Congressmen will say to their constituents when told that they are too old to render good service. Just think of Uncle JOE CANNON being retired on account of age! Look at him there; he is the embodiment of power and strength. Keen of mind, active and strong, capable of holding his own in debate with the strongest—ripe in experience and one of the most useful Members of Congress. [Applause.] Yet under this law he would have been retired nearly 20 years ago and could never have been Speaker of this House. Look at Gen. SHERWOOD, the hero of many battles of the Civil War, a year older than Uncle JOE. Just think of retiring him from Congress because he is too old. What would the people of his district think of a Congress doing such a thing? Why, he is a man full of vigor and fight and capable on the stump and in this House of discussing any public question with anyone however strong intellectually they may be. Why, we Democrats will not listen to such rot as retiring him for he is strong enough to get fifteen or twenty thousand majority in a Republican district. [Applause.] Then look over Maj. STEDMAN. See his erect form, square shoulders, and light step. What say you to applying this rule to him? Why, he was more than five years too old under this law when he was elected to Congress. He is now in his eightieth year, but he is strong in intellect and active on this floor and would be a distinct loss to the House. He is the most perfect specimen of the real gentleman of the Old South. He is the image of his old chieftain, Gen. Robert E. Lee [applause], with whom he served. He is a benediction to us all here—is the most beloved, most respected, most trusted Member of this House. Shame on the man who would even suggest that he is too old and should be retired from this body. [Applause.] Then last, but not least, look at the great Missouri lion, our own beloved CHAMP CLARK [applause], in whose noble soul there is not enough shadow to hide a sinister thought. [Applause.] What say you to applying this law to him? He is now 70 and yet we Democrats make him our leader in this House. What would his people say if you would suggest that he ought to be retired? They would all say: "Yes, retired from the House but advanced to the White House. Till then we will keep him in his present place." [Applause.] Yes, he is strong and vigorous and capable of serving the people of this Nation as a President. Yet under this bill he would have been cast out five years ago. Every member of this House would resist its enforcement if applied to CHAMP CLARK and many other Members of this House over 65. [Applause.] Why, this law would have almost depopulated the Senate a few years ago. [Applause.] What will the thousands of old men who are taxpayers say of this? I see in my mind's eye the stooped forms of thousands of old farmers far past that age going to their toil with the rising of the sun and returning from their labor with tired limbs and aching backs at the going down of the sun. This is the producer of food and the taxpayer.

Now, on the other hand, let us look at the favored class. I see the Government employee getting up at a late hour and going leisurely to his office in the middle of the morning, erect, well clothed, and drawing a salary that would be a princely income to the old farmer. The Government clerk takes his 30 minutes at lunch and in the middle of the afternoon goes on his way with nothing to do until the middle of the next morning. I see him take 30 days' holiday with full pay. If he is sick he gets 30 days' sick leave with pay. He gets pay for every national holiday and does no work. He gets pay for Saturday afternoons during the summer and does no work. He is now told by the Government, "Forget the ant. He is a false philosopher of the past. Look for guidance and example to the gay grasshopper. Spend thy income as thou wilt. Thou needst not save or lay by a store for old age. Thou shalt be cared for by that multitude of toiling masses that thou seest engaged in the low vocation which causes them to earn their bread by the sweat of their faces. They shall not only be compelled to earn enough for themselves, but they shall produce enough to feed you in your old age. If they do not, thou shalt not suffer. I will send my powerful taxgatherers out and take from them what thou needst, and if any shall suffer it shall be that sweating mass who have never been honored by me with an office." Mr. Chairman, I can never give my consent to such legislation. It violates every principle of justice and equality. It establishes a special privilege for a special chosen class. It taxes all the people for the benefit of the few and finds no place in a Republic like ours, that should guarantee to all equal opportunities, equal burdens, and equal benefits.

SOLDIER BONUS.

Measure No. 3, which is pending, is known as the soldier bonus. This is the measure of the Republicans of the House to corrupt the soldier vote in the coming November election. This measure is estimated to cost the American taxpayers from not less than two and a half billions to ten billions of dollars. Where do they propose to raise this vast sum? From the incomes of the rich? No; from the wants of the masses. The principal source of revenue under this proposed bill which has the indorsement of all the Republican leaders is a sales tax—that is to say, on every sale there shall be a tax. Every man who buys a suit of clothes to cover his nakedness or buys a pound of meat to satisfy his hunger will have to pay a tax on the sale. The tax will average about $25 per capita on every man, woman, and child in America to raise this vast sum. The laboring man will pay more than a man of great wealth, because he will eat more. In other words, they propose to tax every man's wants and necessities, and not what he has. They tax hunger and nakedness. Such a tax was never proposed by a civilized government on earth in time of peace.

They claim the soldiers want it. The soldiers never thought of it until the demagogue got busy. What does the demagogue care for the future of the Republic so long as he holds office? He figures that there are four and one-half million voters that he can buy with this Federal money.

This is getting political corruption down to a science when you can tax the masses to pay campaign funds. This is a brazen and shameless bribe offered to our soldiers. When the people are so blind that they can not see the vice and wickedness of such a measure, then the future of our Republic is gone. How can a man who has been honored with the suffrage of the people ever get his consent to thus betray them? Look at the condition of the Treasury to-day. The Government now has outstanding over twenty-six billions of bonds. She owes over three billions, which is being hawked around from bank to bank in the form of certificates. The Victory bonds are now selling at about 86 although they bear 4¼ per cent interest. Our annual budget will amount to five billions of dollars this year. Just stop and think! Five billions in one year in time of peace. More than five times what it was for the year just preceding the war. The people are now staggering under Federal taxation. State, county, and municipal taxes are now higher than ever before, except here in the District of Columbia, where alone they are lower because these favored people of the District have half of their expenses paid out of the Federal Treasury, which, by the way, is a shameless abuse of power by Congress. Yet on top of all this terrible burden this bonus bill is offered and pressed for passage at this time, which will add not less than one billion and a half additional burden upon the people, perhaps even more than this amount for the next year. Do you believe these brave boys who were patriotic enough to offer their lives to save the Republic will now become a party to its destruction?

Mr. Chairman, as bad as this phase of the question is, there is another picture that is worse. It is the effect that it will have upon the boys themselves. This bonus will reduce production. There are in the South alone about 300,000 negro soldiers. This bonus will stop 300,000 plows. How many of our white boys will leave the plow I do not know, but throughout the country many thousands. But this is not the end of it. They will be ruined by this "hand-out," this Government "tip," and will only demand more for the future.

Mr. Chairman, the brave and better class of these soldiers do not want this "bonus." They only ask that their unfortunate comrades be cared for—the lame, halt, blind, and those who by wounds or disease are unable to care for themselves. This all the good people want done, and this the Government will do and is able to do, provided she is not bankrupted by the passage of retirement bills and bonus bills for able-bodied people.

Mr. Chairman, this is a gloomy record for this Republican Congress to go before the people with. They promised to repeal all the war-time legislation, reduce taxes, and reduce the high cost of living. They have taken no steps to do either, unless it is the "hamper-basket bill," and I do not see how the "hamper-basket bill" is going to reduce the cost of living or how the retirement bill will do it, and I am quite unable to see how the bonus bill will increase production or reduce taxes and the cost of living.

Now, gentlemen of the House, let us look at the painful truth and, if possible, find the real cause of the high cost of living and the cause of all this unrest. The prime cause of the high cost of living is underproduction. The cause of underproduction is lack of farm labor. People are leaving the farms because greater opportunities are offered in the cities. They find shorter hours and more pay.

I want some gentleman to rise and say that that is not true. I want any man with any degree of intelligence to say that that is not true. Oh, some men may say that speculators corner the food; but no food corner was ever successful unless there was a scarcity of food. These men who corner food products do not corner them unless the particular class of food is scarce or unless the food is a perishable product, like the fruits of the South, where they may not buy all the fruit, but leave some of it to rot. That is not true of wheat and corn and meat, the basic foods.

And, by the way, this is not demagogy, but it is the truth. You go out on the farm and walk from morning until night behind the plow, and at the end of the year see what you get for your earnings, and you will understand why the boy does not want to stay on the farm. I get tired of these fellows sitting around the lobbies of hotels or in business houses and complaining about the prices that the farmer is getting. Why, bless your soul, if you reduce the price to the farmer of the product which he raises you will reduce the amount that he will raise the next year. No great business man in New York will deny that proposition. If you want more wheat, then give the farmers in the West an assurance that they are going to get a good price for it. If you want more corn, assure the people of the State of Illinois, the great corn State of the Union, that they are going to get a good price for it, and they will plant more corn. Assure the people of Iowa that they are going to get a good price for their meat and they will not slaughter all their stock hogs, but will raise more.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please indicate how we can assure the farmers a reasonable price for their products?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the Government can do that. But we can reduce the Government expenses. I want to take from the back of the farmer every burden that he ought not to bear. This Congress can do. I want to give him some help in respect to his health. This, too, Congress can do. The first appropriation ever given for the specific purpose of rural sanitation I was instrumental in having placed in the sundry civil bill. I got the committee to give $50,000 for this purpose. Then, in the next bill, after a hard fight, I got the committee to give for this service $150,000. The war came on and the money was all used around camps and cantonments to protect the health of the soldiers. Now, if the gentleman wants to help the farmer, I ask him to help me increase the item of $50,000 now in this bill to $150,000. This sum can be spent to assist every farmer in making his premises healthy. Oh, you say we must economize. Yes; we must; but, for God's sake, do not begin with the very people who feed and clothe the Nation. You vote millions on top of millions to care for the health of the Army and Navy and begrudgingly vote only $50,000 for the millions of farmers.

I would also help him by building roads. I would take some of the millions that you spend for other purposes and build good roads. You give many millions now for purposes less important than this. Now, let us act with wisdom and make farm life more attractive and less burdensome than it is now by giving the farmer good roads. Nothing will so quickly develop country life.

I would extend the flood-control law now upon our statute books and straighten out our streams so as to help drain millions of acres of good land now subject to overflow.

These are some of the many practical things we can do for the farmer, so as to give him a share in Government expenditures. The Government has millions invested in road machinery and heavy trucks purchased for war purposes. I would turn these over to our States and counties to be used in building roads and not let them be idle and go to rust.

These things we can do. Will the gentleman join me? His party is now in power, and if they are really interested in the farmer, why not help him now in this way? It will not cost the Government a cent, but will relieve our States and counties of the burden of buying this road machinery.

There is another thing that the great business men of our great cities could do. They could have the great inventive geniuses of this country to devote some of their time to inventions that would improve the means of the cultivation of the soil, develop these, and put them on the market in easy reach of the farmer and at reasonable prices, develop water systems within reach of the farmer in price, so that he can have water works for his home and for his barn. In other words, help thus to make country life attractive. You can not expect the boys to live in the country unless that is done. [Applause.] Not only that, but I want the psychology of this people changed. I want boys and girls to be reared and educated in the fundamental doctrine that a life of real service to mankind is the best life of all; that to so live that you can make the world better by having lived in it is the happiest life. I would teach them that to labor and strive for money alone does not bring happiness; that when this is the chief aim of any life such life is not only a failure but often a real curse to mankind, even though its object is attained and riches are obtained. We are taught in the sacred scriptures that "the love of money is the root of all evil." This one expression has in it so much truth and is so broad and comprehensive that it alone is enough to convince me that the scriptures are inspired. It is the love of money, the desire for riches and wealth, that is causing the people of this country to lose sight of the fundamental principles of truth and virtue, and to strive not for the good of others but to gratify a growing and increasing avarice, and is causing men not to respect and honor the man who actually labors in the field, because here he can not find great riches. Oh, you can not expect to reap any other harvest than that of discontent when the people worship at the shrine of mammon and not at the altar of the living God who teaches us in his sacred word that "the love of money is the root of all evil." You can not as a people long violate God's laws without paying the penalty.

I am going in a moment to show why the boys are leaving the farm.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I can tell the gentleman why they are leaving the farm.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, I can not yield for that, because I have my own idea in regard to why it is, and the gentleman can get his own time to make a speech.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. And I can tell the gentleman how to get them back there.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman can tell me how to get them back, I would like to have him do it and give him all my time and the American Government should build him a monument.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I can tell the gentlemhn in a very few minutes, if he will give me the time.

Mr. SISSON. Very well. I said I would give you all of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. You can get them back on the farm by making it possible for them to get title to the land and make it available to them at actual cost.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, I know the single-taxers——

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. But this is not a single-tax proposition.

Mr. SISSON. How are you going to do it? Take it away from the people?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Why, no. Take the waste places and develop them and sell the people the land at actual cost of reclamation on long time, at a low rate of interest.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, yes; your waste places! Come down into my State and I will show you great lumber companies who own thousands of acres of cut-over pine land that you could have bought a few years ago for two or three dollars an acre.

Now, you want to go and put these boys on this waste land which will cost them $50 an acre to put in shape for cultivation, and then, bless your soul, they could not raise a fuss on it without years of building up. A young soldier from my district, and by the way, he went with the first contingent across the ocean, said, "All of this congressional rot about buying cut-over pine land and this old land out West that nobody would have is bunk. Why don't you go and say to my father, who owns 2,000 acres of land, 'We will buy some of this for your boy,' and then I will know that I can make a living. What sort of fools do you Congressmen think we are? Do you think a boy with any sense will be put off on this old land that no one would take up all these years because no one could make a living on it? You are not fooling the boys with this." This young soldier said that this propaganda came from the large corporations down South who wanted to unload upon the Government this worthless land. Yes; and it is equally true that the West got up the same sort of propaganda to get Uncle Sam to spend money out there. They know these soldiers are not going to go on this land even if Uncle Sam did spend money on it.

Oh, no; that nostrum will not get anywhere with intelligent boys, and, bless your hearts, when you get an unintelligent boy out there the Government is going to have to feed him. [Applause.] But I have been diverted. I was not talking about getting soldier boys placed. I was discussing the general proposition that our boys are leaving the farms because they could better their conditions. I mean a boy like I was. I was born out there. I know all about this farm life. I got my fill of it when I was 18 years old. The last day's plowing I ever did in my life was when I was laying by about 3½ acres of corn for my father, and I had a fast mule——

Mr. GOOD. And that is the last of it.

Mr. SISSON. Bless your soul, that is just a small part of it. We had a way then in the South of laying our corn by, laying our crops by, before the 4th of July. If a fellow did not do that, it was thought he was a poor farmer. As I say, the mule was fast, the stumps were thick, the plow handles hammered me in the short ribs, and you could hear me talking to my mule a mile. When I went home and took the gear off the mule, I told my father I had plowed my last day. My old Scotch-Irish Presbyterian father said, "I hope that is true, my son; but I fear you have not." Cotton was then selling for about 4 cents a pound and corn for about 35 cents a bushel, and I made up my mind I would not work for anyone for any such a price for a bale of cotton. Just think, only $20, and you could not make more than two and one-half to three bales of cotton on the land to save your life. That would give your year's work from $40 to $60. That was not a very attractive outlook to me, so I quit. But I do not care to go further with this biography. But I grew up like a bean pole. I was about as tall as I am now, built like a blowgun. I started out looking for a country school. After some time I found one. I quit plowing and went to teaching school at Kenago, saved a little money, and went to the academy and got a scholarship and went to the Southwestern Presbyterian University, where I met my friend the gentleman [Mr. HERSMAN] in front of me now. When I got through I was overwhelmingly in debt for a boy, but by teaching school three years I paid off the debt and had enough money to take a law course, so I know all about the farming business. I am not talking from theory——

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. No; I have not time to yield any further.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am afraid the gentleman's experience will probably entice other young men to leave the farm.

Mr. SISSON. I will tell you I would not wish to put the damnation on these boys to stay on the farm under such conditions, but what I want to do is to help the conditions to be better; I want the treatment of these farmer boys to be better; I do not want them to be left in poverty and hunger, as many of them are. You find men now owning several thousand acres of land and doing what they call farming. That is not farming. I am talking about real farming, where you get the clods in your own shoe. I am talking about the real farmer, the man who actually produces the food, who knows the feel of the plow handle in doing a day's work.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. OLIVER. What inducement does the gentleman think he would have to offer the gentleman from Idaho to go on this waste land?

Mr. SISSON. I have too much respect for my friend's intelligence to believe that you could induce him to go on this waste land, but I can not yield further, as my time is limited, and I have much more that I want to say.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. SISSON. Make it very short, indeed.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will. The gentleman is 49 years of age, I believe, although he looks much younger.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, the gentleman flatters me. I am 50.

Mr. LANGLEY. Well, 50 then. If the gentleman was 18 when he quit plowing, because farm products were so low, then the way I figure it out it was under Cleveland's administration when these conditions existed, and when the gentleman says cotton was 4 cents a pound and corn 35 cents a bushel? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about. You Republicans brought the country to such a bad state of affairs that Grover Cleveland was elected, and he and the Democrats brought it out, and you inherited all the good from that legislation of Mr. Cleveland, and have been claiming it ever since. [Applause on the Democratic side.] However, gentlemen, I have some other things I would like to talk about for a few minutes.

The farmer to succeed must labor from sun up to sun down in all sorts of weather. He must be up before the dawn and prepare for the day's labor. He must go in mud and rain. His children do not get good schools. His roads are bad. His taxes are high; he can not hide his broad acres from the taxgatherer. At the end of the year he has been able only by rigid economy and self-denial to make ends meet and keep out of debt. Many of them do not even do this. His boys and girls see his heavy labors and poor returns, and they decide that they will not spend their lives on the farm, and at the first opportunity go to town. There they are attracted by the white lights, the moving-picture shows, and good pay.

AUTOMOBILES.

Some of our new industries that have grown in a few years into giants are offering wages which the farmer can not pay. The automobile industry is one of the chief offenders. It is estimated that there are more than a million able-bodied men now engaged in producing pleasure cars alone—cars which add nothing to the production of food and clothing. These men have been taken very largely from the farms. The wages paid are far in excess of what the farmer can pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield the gentleman 15 minutes additional.

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman.

MOVING PICTURES.

The moving picture is another industry which is affecting our industrial life to a greater extent than at first thought might be apparent. In the city of Washington alone there are about 70 moving-picture shows. They are everywhere. Thousands of men are engaged in manufacturing the moving-picture machines. Still other thousands are engaged in producing the films, and other thousands running the shows in every city, town, and village in America. Not one of these so engaged produces anything, but each of them is added to the already large list of consumers. It is estimated that about 37,000,000 people daily attend moving-picture shows in America. Here again you find not only lost energy but millions spent for pleasure of at least doubtful value in many cases.

BASEBALL.

Then again there are thousands of men engaged in the baseball industry. How many thousands, I have no idea. But thousands of men are engaged either in the manufacture and sale of baseball goods, conducting the parks, or engaged in the game as officers, managers, and players. The game is no longer played for pleasure and physical development by our boys, but is now a business and a profession. This business adds thousands to the list of consumers and produces nothing.

I have not time sufficient to call attention to all the varied pleasure producing industries in America, but this is sufficient to convince a contemplative mind that our people are given too much to games and pleasure seeking, all of which adds to the number of consumers and decreases the number of producers. This condition throughout the country is inducing men and boys to leave the farms. This is rapidly taking Uncle Sam's feet off of the ground, and if it is not checked, our boasted institutions will fail, and there will be reenacted another tragedy here on this American soil as great as any tragedy ever enacted on the stage of nations.

Now, I wish I had time to discuss with you at length the remedy for this unrest. My judgment is that a great deal of this unrest is caused by idleness, as I said. I do not believe we work as hard or as much in a day as we used to work. I believe our remedy is more work, which means more production. The sacred book, the Bible, is the surest guide not only for a man's conduct in his private life, but is also the surest guide for the conduct of a great nation, if the fundamental truths stated therein are the basis of the national laws, and if those laws are observed by the people of that nation its safety and prosperity are secure; and this is accepted as true even by those who are not Christians, because all good men believe in the perfection of this Christian philosophy.

The first positive injunction given to man for his government is furnished in the commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." The preachers talk a good deal about this, but the next clause I have never heard a preacher take as a text, "Six days shalt thou labor." If every man in America would live up to this doctrine, there would be less unrest, there would be plenty, there would be peace. If I had my way about it, I would have every minister of the gospel in America of whatever faith or persuasion, Protestant or Catholic, thunder from his sacred desk on this text until its truth is accepted and practiced by all of our people.

You have got to get the minds and the hearts of the boys and girls set right on this question; you have got to let them understand the fundamental cause of prosperity and happiness. We must discard the pagan doctrine that prosperity is the chief blessing and accept the Christian doctrine that self-sacrifice and adversity are the chief blessings.

I believe the new dispensation should be the guide and light to man's faith in private and public life. Prosperity, money making, ease, and comfort never made a man or a nation great. It is self-sacrifice and service that are the mysterious benediction of the greatest Teacher that the world ever saw, Christ himself.

Do you know that a rich country never produced great men? It has been adversity that has produced our great men. It has been trial that has developed the human race, and by these trials and by these great efforts on the part of great men, great institutions are founded, and upon the success of these institutions are based the prosperity and happiness of the people.

But the very success of these institutions brought about by the self-sacrifice and labor of great and good men, giving every man equal opportunity under the law, induces people to labor and produce great abundance for all; it also gives the men who are moved by pagan principles opportunity to corrupt the institutions and by securing special privileges under the law, they are enabled, by the exercise of cunning, to amass great wealth, absorbing what others produce, and sapping the very foundations of equality and justice by taking what they have not earned. Thus in a few generations you have a few rich and many poor. This seems to have resulted in every age of the world's history. Can it ever be avoided? I am sure that it can not unless we can make it difficult by law to amass great fortunes.

The man that produces anything of value is entitled to own what he produces. This is a fundamental law of nature. As civilization advances, the kinds of labor increase; some direct and some take directions. Without wise direction, there is lost energy. Without wise direction, men never emerge from a savage state. So he who gives value to others by his brain is just as much a laborer as the man who does the physical toil. But the man with the strong and acquisitive mind should not be permitted to give directions to laws under which he can acquire more than his share. Property is the result of labor Therefore, whatever tends to make it difficult to amass quickly mighty fortunes is, in my judgment, the best legislation.

The government that is so devised and conducted that each man shall enjoy the fruits of his own toil is the best government. I have stated the underlying principles of a democratic government. Since property of all kinds is the product of labor, the more labor the more property there is. Therefore, we must look to labor for the production of food. No amount of "Be it enacted by law" can produce any property. Legislation can not produce food, clothing, building material, or any other kind of property. "Be it enacted by law" by this body or by the State legislatures will never produce a bushel of wheat or corn; it will never raise hogs or cattle. It can not be done that way. But since legislation, however, can control property after it has been produced, it can by special favor give one man more than he is entitled to or give him greater advantages in acquiring what others have earned. This is legislation which I hate.. This is legislation which causes the man who toils to lose confidence in government. The fact that bad laws have been passed to enrich one class at the expense of another has caused all the people to look to the Government for help. This is a dangerous state of public mind. I have endeavored to show that government can not produce; it can only control. Now, what we need in America is to repeal every law that gives one man or set of men any advantage of another so that all men may have equal rights and opportunities under the law. Every good man would then feel like using his very best endeavors, because in this way and in this alone could he succeed. He would know that his Government would protect him in his right to what he earned by the sweat of his own face. There would then be no man too rich, for he would have only what he had earned. The thriftless and idle would be the only ones to suffer. This, then, would be as it should be.

Let us quit this miserable practice of looking to legislation for everything. Let us only ask for a square deal. The wisest legislators in this House, in my judgment, without a single exception, will say that this is the correct theory and that to depart from it tends to dishonor the Republic in the minds of the people.

I can not say all that I would like to say, for my time is drawing to a close. But I do want to say that every young man should be taught that he should always be bigger than his job. If a man wants to succeed in this life and become the manager of the industry in which he labors he must always be bigger than his job. He must be more interested in the success of his work and his labors than he is in the wages which he receives. Those are the men who have succeeded; those are the men who are managing the great industries. Men do not fail except by virtue of their own inherent weakness unless they are providentially interfered with in some way.

I believe, gentlemen, that there never was a time in the history of this Republic when men who wanted to labor could find a job quicker and could get better wages than they can right now.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, let me say that Congress can, if it will, do something to relieve the situation. We can by heroic work reduce the taxes. It is going to take hard work to do it, because every man on the pay roll wants to stay and wants more pay. But I pledge myself in the future as in the past to use my best efforts to this end. By reducing taxes we will release many thousand men for employment in productive industries.

Since I have been a Member of Congress this has been impressed upon me as much as any other one thing, and that is that we are spending millions of dollars of the people's money for certain governmental activities for which we are getting nothing of value in return, and the more you extend these governmental activities the more taxes you must have and the more labor you take out of productive pursuits. I have worked diligently, as every Member of this House knows, to cut down expenses, and have thereby saved the taxpayers many millions of dollars.

Governments, like men, can only succeed, when they are overwhelmingly in debt, in two ways: First, by speeding up, and, second, by more rigid economy. If you find a man in debt in private life and find him squandering what he earns and not devoting his time and attention to his business, you at once say, "He is a trifling man, and is bound to fail." When you see a man in debt go to his labor vigorously, working hard, denying himself, not counting the hours, and when you find him economizing every day, the bankers and those who know him say of him, "There is a man you can trust." Why? Because he is honest, untiring, and trying to get out of debt.

You can not deal with a government otherwise than as you deal with individuals. The only difference is you are dealing with millions in one case and dealing with one man in the other. If the Government would succeed in relieving the situation it will be necessary to have the minds and hearts of the people in a condition where they are willing to speed up. The Government is behind. It is in debt and the annual interest is enormous. You must reduce the expenses in order that you may pay the debt, and the people must make some sacrifices in time of peace as they did in time of war. The Government has got two things to do: First, it has to economize, and second, it has to impress upon the people the necessity of speeding up, and that is the only way that Uncle Sam is going to be able to solve this problem, in my judgment. [Applause.]

There are some people now advocating universal military training and increasing the number of officers in the Army for this purpose. In my judgment this does not help but hurts the situation. By that means you would be adding more people to the pay roll of the Government and taking more people out of productive pursuits, because no Army officer ever earned a thing on the face of the earth. By earning I mean producing. In the nature of things he is a consumer, and the founders of this Republic warned us against large standing armies that might be quartered on the people, eating up their substance. We went to war with Germany telling our boys and telling our people that we were determined to destroy militarism in the world. We did not love militarism then but hated it.

Now, we find men going over the country endeavoring to establish in the minds of the people of the Republic a willingness to accept militarism, exactly like that which first existed in Germany, and which finally resulted in the military despotism of Prussianism. This shall never have my approval. I hate compulsory military training now as much as ever. The only thing we need is to have a small corps of well-trained officers who can in time of war do as our officers did in this war, train the boys for a few months. We saw them converted in that time into the best soldiers on earth. Let us rely upon our young men, because our Government is great and good and worthy to be defended, and thousands of strong hands and brave hearts will leap to her defense upon the first sign of danger. If the Government is not good and not loved by our people, then all the military training on earth can not save it.

Therefore, let us as a people uphold and defend our Constitution, the surest bulwark of our freedom and liberty, with our trust in God and determined to rely upon truth and justice, and our Republic will endure to bless mankind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

WINNERS IN NATIONAL ESSAY CONTEST.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Members of the House would be glad at this time to have him point out to them that there are now in the Speaker's seat in the gallery a boy and two girls who were the winners of the three prizes in the national essay contest, which was participated in by 10,000,000 children of the country, under the auspices of the Secretary of War, on the subject of "The Benefits of an Enlistment in the United States Army." The Come Back, published in the interest of the wounded men of the Walter Reed Army General Hospital, conducted the contest in conjunction with the War Department. The national judges were the Secretary of War, Gen. Pershing, and Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, United States Army. The first prize was won by an Iowa boy, Donald L. Campbell, of Clinton, Iowa [applause]; the second was won by a Missouri girl, Majorie Sheetz, of Chillicothe, Mo. [applause]; and the third was won by a Mississippi girl, Bettie Bowen Eason, of Olive Branch, Miss. [applause].

If the commission shall not so find, and if no public lands or reservations are affected, permission is hereby granted to construct such dam or other project works in such streams upon compliance with State laws."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the House conferees may be printed in the RECORD immediately following the Report just read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the statement may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, to repeal section 18 of "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes," and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the committee of conference submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

On amendment No. 1: In lieu of the provision in the House bill that the commission shall appoint an executive secretary, the Senate provided that the commission shall request the President of the United States to detail an officer from the United States Engineer Corps to serve the commission as executive secretary and engineer officer, his duties to be prescribed by the commission. The conferees restored the House provision requiring the commission to appoint an executive secretary and adopted the Senate provision as to detailing an officer from the United States Engineer Corps to serve as engineer officer, the request for such detail being permissive, instead of mandatory, as in the Senate provision. The Senate provision that the officer should also serve as executive secretary was stricken out.

On amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6: These amendments are verbal changes perfecting the text.

On amendment No. 7: This amendment recasts the House definition of "reservations."

On amendment No. 8: This amendment recasts the House definition as to the term "navigable waters," the House agreeing to the Senate definition with an amendment inserting after the word "interruptions" the words "between the navigable parts of such streams or waters," thus making it clear that although the navigable parts of such streams may be interrupted by falls, shallows, or rapids, the portions occupied by falls, shallows, or rapids are within the jurisdiction of Congress and that no dams can be constructed at, upon, or across such falls, shallows, or rapids without securing a license as provided in the bill. Under the House definition of "navigable waters" it might be possible to construct dams at the very point where dams would have to be located without securing such license. The Senate definition, moreover, limits the application of the act to those cases where interstate or foreign commerce will be directly affected.

On amendment No. 9: Strikes out certain words not necessary to the definition of "Government dam."

On amendment No. 10: This amendment perfects the text with reference to the definition of "net investment."

On amendment No. 11: This amendment requires as to net investment that the classification of investment of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, in so far as applicable, be published and promulgated as a part of the rules and regulations of the commission. This is for the purpose of publicity.

On amendments Nos. 12, 13, and 14: These amendments are verbal, perfecting the text.

On amendment No. 15: Amendment No. 15, with the amendment agreed to in conference, is merely an elaboration of the provision already contained in lines 1 to 15, inclusive, on page 12, relating to the examination of books and accounts of licensees, the submission of statements and reports, including full information as to assets and liabilities, capitalization, net investment, etc. The amendment as modified requires the licensee to file with the commission "a statement in duplicate showing the actual legitimate cost of construction of such project, addition, or betterment, and the price paid for water rights, rights of way, lands, or interest in lands."

On amendment No. 16: This is merely a verbal amendment perfecting the text.

On amendment No. 17: This amendment prohibited the issuance of any licenses affecting tribal lands embraced within Indian reservations which were ceded to the Indians by the United States by treaty except by and with the consent of the council of the tribe. The Senate conferees receded from this amendment. The conferees saw no reason why water-power use should be singled out from all other uses of Indian reservation land for special action of the council of the tribe.

On amendment No. 18: This amendment is verbal, perfecting the text.

On amendment No. 19: Amendment No. 19 provides that upon the filing of any application for a license which has not been preceded by a preliminary permit under subsection (e) of section 4, notice shall be given and published as required by the proviso of said subsection.

On amendments Nos. 20 and 21: These amendments are verbal, perfecting the text.

On amendment No. 22: Amendment No. 22, giving authority to the commission to investigate as to the utility of tunnels and to make rules and regulations for their use, has been eliminated from the bill, the Senate conferees having receded. No sufficient reason was presented why the authority to investigate should be limited to one particular type of water conduit rather than to all the major structures of a power project.

On amendments Nos. 23, 24, 25, and 26: These amendments are verbal changes and were considered desirable, as they clarify the text.

On amendment No. 27: This amendment relates to the construction on the Potomac River of a power plant outlined in project No. 3, House Document No. 1400, Sixty-second Congress, third session, generally known as the Great Falls project. The amendment authorized the commission to construct said project under its direct supervision or to enter into contracts for materials and labor for the construction of the same, or any part of the same, as in its judgment may be the most practical and economical, not exceeding a limitation of cost of $25,000,000. In lieu of the amendment the conferees recommended a substitute authorizing and directing the commission—

"To investigate and, on or before the 1st day of January, 1921, report to Congress the cost and, in detail, the economic value of the power plant outlined in project numbered 3, House Document No. 1400, Sixty-second Congress, third session, in view of existing conditions, utilizing such study as may heretofore have been made by any department of the Government; also, in connection with such project to submit plans and estimates of cost necessary to secure an increased and adequate water supply for the District of Columbia. For this purpose the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated."

On amendments Nos. 28, 29, 30, and 31: These amendments of section 8 relating to the involuntary transfer of licenses were not, with the exception of amendment No. 30, relating to judicial sales, adopted by the conferees, the Senate having receded from its amendments.

On amendments Nos. 32, 33, 34, and 35: These amendments are verbal, perfecting the text.

On amendment No. 36: This amendment relates to the charge imposed upon the licensee for water power developed. The House bill, in paragraph (e) of section 10, provided "that the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission." The Senate bill provided that "the licensee shall pay for the license herein granted such reasonable annual charges as may be fixed by the commission, for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for the cost of administration of the act in relation to water powers developed under its jurisdiction." The licensee was also to pay for the use and occupation of any public lands and lands in reservations, except tribal lands embraced within Indian reservations, necessary for the development of the project covered by the license such reasonable annual charges based upon the actual value of the Government lands used as might be fixed by the commission; but in no event should the annual charge for the foregoing exceed 25 cents per developed horsepower. In lieu of both Senate and House provisions as to charges the conferees recommend the following:

"That the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for the costs of the administration of this act; for recompensing it for the use, occupancy, and enjoyment of its lands or other property; and for the expropriation to the Government of excessive profits until the respective States shall make provision for preventing excessive profits or for the expropriation thereof to themselves, or until the period of amortization as herein provided is reached, and in fixing such charges the commission shall seek to avoid increasing the price to the consumers of power by such charges, and charges for the expropriation of excessive profits may be adjusted from time to time by the commission as conditions may require."

On amendment No. 37: This amendment directs that licenses when issued for the development, transmission, or distribution of power by States or municipalities shall be issued and enjoyed without charge when "sold to the public without profit."

On amendment No. 38: This amendment permits the issuance of licenses without charge in projects of not more than 100-horsepower capacity when such power is used for the development, transmission, or distribution of power for domestic, mining, or other beneficial use. The House bill fixed this limit at 50 and the Senate bill at 200 horsepower.

On amendment No. 39: This amendment removes the exemption from charge where the power is developed upon tribal lands within Indian reservations.

On amendment No. 40: This amendment is verbal and perfects the text.

On amendment No. 41: This amendment makes it mandatory upon the licensee to reimburse the owner of a reservoir or other improvement for such part of the annual charges for interest, maintenance, and depreciation thereon as the commission may deem equitable.

On amendments Nos. 42 and 43: These amendments strike from the House bill the provision authorizing the commission, in its discretion, to waive certain conditions, provisions, and requirements of the act in issuing licenses for a part only of a complete project, where the land of the United States required is to be used only for transmission lines, water conduits, or for storage reservoirs, or for a complete project of not more than 50-horsepower capacity. In lieu of the House provision the Senate excepted from such waiver the license period of 50 years and increased the horsepower capacity to 200 horsepower. The House conferees agreed to the Senate substitute with an amendment reducing the horsepower capacity to 100. Under the House provision the commission could allow perpetual grants without conditions for transmission lines, water conduits, and storage reservoirs if the remainder of the project was on private land.

On amendment No. 44: This amendment provides that the licensee shall not directly or indirectly discriminate or permit discrimination in the apportionment, allotment, transmission, distribution, sale, or lease of power or electrical energy or current in favor of any municipality as against any other or others in respect of service, rates, or the quantity of power or electrical energy or current transmitted or supplied to it or them. The Senate receded from this amendment. Under this Senate amendment, had it been retained, the licensee serving two adjacent cities, if he could not develop a new source of supply, might cancel a part of his contracts in one city and transfer the power to another city. Under such conditions no user of power in either city could get a binding contract and no one would purchase of the licensee if any other source of supply was available. Such a provision would lead to the raiding of one municipality by another, would keep business enterprises away, and would make power development under the act hazardous.

On amendment No. 45: Amendment No. 45, in section 12, as agreed to by the conferees is a substitute for both Senate and House provisions relating to applications for projects involving the construction of a lock or locks, or other navigation structures. The House provision was "the commission may before taking action upon such application cause a report," etc., to be made to Congress. The Senate provision was that the commission "shall take no action," but cause a report, etc. The substitute as recommended by the conferees provides that the commission "may grant the application with the provision to be expressed in the license that the licensee will install the necessary navigation structures if the Government fails to make provision therefor within a time to be fixed in the license and" cause a report to be made to Congress.

On amendment No. 46: This amendment relates to severance damages and provides that such damages "shall not exceed the aggregate actual expenses or loss for maintenance, depreciation, and interest upon such part of the property not taken as is made temporarily idle by the severance therefrom of the property taken; such aggregate expenses to be computed for a period reasonably necessary for providing a substitute source of power and in no case to exceed the value of the works taken." This amendment is a partial statement of the principle adopted by the California Railroad Commission for fixing severance damages in the case of the valuation for purposes of purchase by the city of Los Angeles of certain properties of the Southern California Edison Co. While the rule was an equitable one under the circumstances of that particular case, where the company was left in possession of its main transmission system and its largest generating plants, it might be inequitable in cases where, for example, the generating plants were all taken and the transmission and distributing systems left. The Senate receded from the amendment and it has been eliminated, the conferees believing that the existing provisions of section 14 were sufficient to take care of the matter of severance damages.

On amendment No. 47: This amendment is merely verbal.

On amendment No. 48: This amendment relates to the terms of the license. The House bill provided: "That in the event the United States does not exercise the right to take over and does not issue a new license to the original or a new licensee, then the commission shall issue from year to year an annual license to the then licensee under the terms and conditions of the original license until the property is taken over or a new license is issued as aforesaid." The Senate bill provided: "That in the event the United States does not exercise the right to take over or does not issue a license to a new licensee, or tender a new license to the original licensee, upon the terms and conditions aforesaid which is accepted," then the commission, etc. The conferees agreed to the Senate amendment, amending it, however, so as to read as follows: "Provided, That in the event the United States does not exercise the right to take over or does not issue a license to a new licensee, or issue a new license to the original licensee upon reasonable terms," then the commission, etc. The House conferees contended that the retention of the words, "which is accepted," in the Senate amendment would practically result in a perpetual franchise. These words were eliminated and the Senate amendment modified as above set forth was agreed to.

On amendment No. 49: This amendment relates to the disposition of charges arising from licenses. The House bill provided that such charges should be paid into the Treasury of the United States; then 50 per cent of the charge arising from licenses for the occupancy and use of national forests was reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury for the survey, construction, and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests. Fifty per cent of the charges arising from licenses for the occupancy and use of national parks was to be reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury, to be expended in the improvement and development of such parks. Fifty per cent of the charges arising from licenses for the occupancy and use of public lands, and of national monuments and power site or other reserves outside of national forests, was to be paid into the reclamation fund. All proceeds from any Indian reservation were to be placed to the credit of the Indians of such reservation. Fifty per cent of the charges arising from all other licenses were to be placed in a special fund to be expended in the maintenance and operation of dams and other navigation structures owned by the United States, or in the construction, maintenance, or operation of headwater or other improvements of navigable waters of the United States. The Senate bill provided that all charges arising from licenses were to be paid into the Treasury of the United States and to be reserved as a special fund therein. Such part of said fund as Congress might from time to time direct was to be appropriated toward paying the costs of administration of the act and of conducting the investigations authorized thereunder. The remainder, if any, in so far as the same might be derived from dams in navigable streams, was to be expended in the maintenance and operation of dams or other navigation structures owned by the United States or in the construction, maintenance, and operation of headwater or other improvements of streams. In so far as such funds were derived from licenses to occupy portions of the public lands, one half thereof was to be paid into the reclamation fund and the other half was to be paid to the States in which the lands occupied were located in the proportion to each that the amount derived from the lands within its bounds bore to the whole amount derived from the occupancy of all such lands. The proceeds from licenses authorizing the occupancy of any part of any Indian reservation were to be placed to the credit of the Indians of such reservations.

In lieu of both Senate and House provisions as to the disposition of funds derived from charges the conferees agreed to the following substitute:

"That all proceeds from any Indian reservation shall be placed to the credit of the Indians of such reservation. All other charges arising from licenses hereunder shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, subject to the following distribution: Twelve and one-half per cent thereof is hereby appropriated to be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to 'Miscellaneous receipts'; 50 per cent of the charges arising from licenses hereunder for the occupancy and use of public lands, national monuments, national forests, and national parks shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress known as the reclamation act, approved June 17, 1902; and 37½ per cent of the charges arising from licenses hereunder for the occupancy and use of national forests, national parks, public lands, and national monuments, from development within the boundaries of any State shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to such State; and 50 per cent of the charges arising from all other licenses hereunder is hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in the maintenance and operation of dams and other navigation structures owned by the United States or in the construction, maintenance, or operation of headwater or other improvements of navigable waters of the United States."

The plan of distributing these funds, as contained in the above substitute, follows, with some change in the percentages, the plan of distribution adopted in the oil leasing act recently passed.

On amendment No. 50: This amendment relates to the regulation of the issuance of securities and provides that securities issued by the licensee shall be subject to such regulations as prescribed by the commission, but they shall be allowed only for the "bona fide purpose of financing and conducting the business of such licensee."

On amendment No. 51: This amendment is a verbal change.

On amendments Nos. 52, 53, and 54: These amendments in section 21 relate to the acquisition by any licensee of dam sites through the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Amendment No. 54 states the conditions under which the right may be exercised.

On amendments Nos. 55 and 56: These amendments are verbal changes.

On amendment No. 57: This amendment provides for the determination of the valuation of projects already constructed when application is made for a licensee to come under the provisions of the act. Without such a provision there would be no means of determining valuation. One of the fundamental elements of the act is the current determination of the "net investment." No project should be brought under license until steps have been taken to determine the property value which is to be recognized throughout the entire duration of the license.

The amendment provides that "fair value" is the most satisfactory basis of determination at the date of the issuance of the license. The House conferees objected to the proviso at the end of amendment No. 57 to the effect—

"That no contract, which shall have been lawfully made prior to the passage of this act, not extending beyond the term of the license, for power, light, heat, or water, or for the service or delivery of the same to be furnished from any project works, and to which such project works, or the person, company, or corporation constructing, owning, or operating the same shall be subject, shall be affected by any license under this act, and no such person, association, or corporation shall be released from any lawful obligation by reason of this act or of any license granted thereunder."

The House conferees believed that the only purpose of this proviso was to prevent review in rate-making proceedings of any contract for power entered into prior to the passage of the act. Presumably this part of the amendment has particular reference to contracts at Niagara Falls. Public utility commissions in general have the right to review and to require the alteration of contracts which are not in the public interest. If contracts are in the public interest it is not to be presumed that the power granted under the act will be employed to annul or alter them, and hence no amendment would be needed in such circumstances. If they are not in the public interest, the latter half of the amendment would prevent their annulment or alteration, at least by any of the agencies provided in the act. This part of the amendment is, therefore, not proposed in the public interest, but for the purpose of protecting contracts which can not otherwise be defended before public rate-making bodies. The Senate conferees receded from this proviso in amendment No. 57 and it was eliminated from the bill.

Amendment No. 58: This amendment seeks to prescribe how a stream of doubtful navigability may be determined as within the provisions of the law, and in substance it provides that the commission shall ascertain whether the interests of commerce are affected; if not, then permission is granted to construct in accordance with the State laws.

Amendment No. 59: This amendment is a revision of section 18 of the rivers and harbors act approved August 8, 1917, creating a Waterways Commission. While in general the provisions of the amendment are identical with the original act, it changes the personnel of the commission and omits paragraphs 3 and 4 of the original act. The first of these paragraphs granted authority to employ expert assistance and made an appropriation of $100,000 for the expenses of the commission. The second paragraph authorized the employment of clerical and other help in the District of Columbia. In view of the fact that many of the duties imposed upon this Waterways Commission will be assigned to the Water Power Commission under the pending bill and other duties have already been assigned to other governmental agencies under the transportation act of 1920, the House conferees opposed this amendment. The Senate conferees receded, and the amendment has been eliminated.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin suggest some agreement about the time?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the rule governing the debate on a conference report, the time be extended to two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and one-half to be controlled by myself, and that at the end of the debate I be recognized to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be limited to two hours, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and that at the end of the two hours he be recognized to move the previous question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, the last dam act which passed Congress was the act of 1910. Since that time there have been but very few applications filed for the right to construct dams upon navigable streams. In fact, there have been but 140,000 horsepower developed upon navigable streams since the act of 1910 was put upon the statute books. No applications under that act have been made in recent years.

I will not indulge in any preliminaries, but will call attention to some features in connection with the conference report.

There were 59 Senate amendments. As to these the Senate receded from 8, and 14 were agreed to with amendments. I wish to call attention to those agreed to with amendments, they being the ones giving rise to controversy between the Senate and House conferees.

The first amendment, found on page 2 of the bill, relates to the appointment of an executive secretary. As we had it in the House bill we provided—

That the commission shall appoint an executive secretary, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, and prescribe his duties.

The Senate substituted the following:

That the commission shall request the President of the United States to detail an officer from the United States Engineer Corps to serve the commission as executive secretary and engineer officer, his duties to be prescribed by the commission.

The conferees reported the provision restoring the House language with reference to the appointment of an executive secretary and adding the following:

And the commission may request the President of the United States to detail an officer from the United States Engineer Corps to serve the commission as engineer officer, his duties to be prescribed by the commission.

The change made by the conferees was to the effect that the Water Power Commission may request the President to detail an officer of the Engineer Corps to act as engineer officer. We did not make it mandatory. We did not make the engineer officer the sole executive officer of the commission, because we felt that that would practically magnify the importance of the War Department in connection with water-power development; and in view of the fact that the largest water-power development is possible on the public domain and in the forest reserves, we did not believe in giving such a disproportionate power or recognition to the War Department, so that we left it permissive with the commission to request the President to detail an Army officer. If we had left it as the Senate had it, with an Army officer as the engineer officer and executive secretary, such officer would only serve during his detail, and then would have to go back to the line, and there would thus be lost to the office that continuity of service which would make him valuable to the Government.

Of course, the expense of the Army officer would not be material, as he would be paid whether he served with the commission or not.

I next call attention to amendment No. 8 on page 4 of the bill. This deals with the definition of navigable waters. As the water-power bill in the last Congress left the House it did not contain a definition of navigable waters. A definition was inserted in conference, and the conference report was adopted by the House. In this Congress we reinserted the House definition as to navigable waters. The Senate struck out the House definition and inserted a definition of its own, and in conference the Senate definition has been retained with an amendment suggested by the conferees.

The weakness of the House definition of navigable waters lay in the fact that it excluded from the navigable waters over which the commission would have jurisdiction the shoals, shallows, falls, and rapids, which would be the very portions of a navigable stream where the dams would be located. Under the House definition, therefore, we feared that we would not be able to regulate or control the construction of a dam at shoals, shallows, falls, or rapids even in a navigable stream. Hence we concluded that the Senate definition was preferable to the House definition. But in order to make even the Senate definition more clear we inserted the words "between the navigable parts of such streams or waters," so as clearly to indicate that even in a navigable stream, where the navigable portions were separated by falls, shallows, or rapids, the falls, shallows, or rapids should also be considered as navigable waters.

Personally I think they would have been considered such anyhow under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Montello case, recorded in Twentieth Wallace. But to remove any doubt we have accepted the definition of navigable waters with the amendment suggested by the conferees. This amendment No. 8 should be taken into consideration with amendment No. 58 in the latter portion of the bill, where it is sought to aid applicants who desire to build power plants upon streams of doubtful navigability.

Amendment No. 27 provides for the construction of a power plant at or near Great Falls on the Potomac. You will remember that some three years ago a similar proposition was adopted by the Senate at the instance of Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska. It has been inserted by amendment on the floor of the Senate in this water-power bill. It provides that the Water Power Commission shall have the right to construct a dam at Great Falls, either under its own supervision or by contract, with an authorized expenditure not in excess of $25,000,000; that in connection with the power project there should also be considered the matter of securing an additional water supply for the District of Columbia. The conferees, after careful deliberation, decided to eliminate this amendment from the bill. We were persuaded so to do not merely because of the very large appropriation authorized, namely, $25,000,000, but because of the fact that no committee of the Senate or House had given thorough, careful consideration to all the details of this very great project. We all conceded the advisability and necessity of a water-power development at Great Falls in the not distant future and that an increased water supply should be secured for the city of Washington. But we did not believe that it would be advisable to do this through an amendment to a general water-power bill; that to do this might establish a precedent which might be urged to force Congress to construct water-power projects in other sections of the country.

While we have eliminated the provision of the bill relating to the Great Falls project, we have recommended a substitute. The substitute in brief provides that the Water Power Commission created by this act shall at once consider the plan as set forth in the Senate amendment based upon the report of Col. Langfitt, made in the Sixty-second Congress, known as House Document 1400; that it could take into consideration other plans and make further surveys, and, at the same time, it should also take into consideration the cost of the additional water supply for the District of Columbia, and for all these purposes we appropriate $25,000, or so much as may be necessary. We also provide that the commission shall file a report by the 1st of January, 1921. We did this in the interest of expedition, so that Congress may have the necessary data and information by the 1st of January to enable it to act.

The next amendment is No. 36, page 22, and relates to the charges for water-power development. The matter of a charge for the development of power has been, from the beginning, one of the leading points of issue between the Senate and the House. The Senate has consistently opposed the making of a charge for power development on the ground that there was no constitutional warrant for the making of such a charge. The House almost as consistently has insisted that it had a right to make such a charge on the theory that where Congress grants a right to obstruct navigation on a navigable stream it has the right to impose such conditions as it sees fit. The House provision with reference to the charge was as follows:

That the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission.

This imposed no limitation whatever upon the power to make a charge on the part of the commission. The Senate, in its amendment, however, provided that "the licensee shall pay for the license herein granted such reasonable charge as may be fixed by the commission for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for the cost of administration"— of the act in relation to water powers developed under its jurisdiction, in the proportion that the water power developed by the project covered by said license bears to the total water power developed by all projects licensed under the act, and for that purpose such charges may be readjusted from time to time, not oftener than once in two years; the licensee shall also pay for the use and occupation of any public lands and lands in reservations, except tribal lands embraced within Indian reservations, necessary for the development of the project covered by the license such reasonable annual charges based upon the actual value of the Government lands used as may be fixed by the commission; but in no event shall the annual charge for the foregoing exceed 25 cents per developed horsepower.

The conferees did not accept in full either Senate or House provisions as to the making of the charge, but recommended a substitute to the effect that the licensee should pay the necessary reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for the cost of the administration of the act. This constituted one ground for the charge.

Another ground was recompensing the United States for the use, occupancy, and enjoyment of its land or other property; and a third, for the expropriation to the Government of excessive profits until the respective States should make provision for preventing excessive profits, or for the expropriation thereof to themselves, or until the period of amortization as herein provided is reached, and in fixing such charges the commission shall seek to avoid increasing the price to the consumers of power by such charges, and charges for expropriation of excessive profits may be adjusted from time to time by the commission as conditions may require.

Under the provisions of this bill no charge is levied upon a municipality or any other governmental agency or the State itself for the power developed by dams constructed by such State or municipality, and when the power is for public-utility purposes and not sold for profit. The only source of a charge would be upon the agency, private in its character, which furnished power to public utilities or for its own use.

In a case where a private plant builds alongside the dam and uses the power created, there is no State utility commission, there is no Federal authority, to regulate its rates. It is not a public utility in any sense, and there would be no method of reaching the excess profits of an institution of that kind. We decided, therefore, that in view of the fact that such a plant is private in its character and could not be reached by the regulatory body of the State or by the Federal Government under this bill, we could reach its excess profits, if any, by right of expropriation, as provided in this conference substitute. However, we retain in the compromise agreement the provision as to the fixing of the charge for the power developed upon a Government dam, and also allow periods for the adjustment of such charge in terms of 10 years after the first 20 years have elapsed.

Amendment No. 44 relates to discriminations and was offered on the floor of the Senate. Its purpose is to prohibit any company, corporation, or individual selling or leasing or disposing of power, heat, or light to discriminate as between different localities. We did not believe that such an amendment would be workable, and therefore eliminated this amendment from the bill. For instance, here are two communities adjacent to each other supplied by a common power plant. One community grows twice as fast as the other. In order to comply with this amendment, the producer of the power would have to take from the community that was growing less and supply the community that was growing more rapidly, and thus give rise to a charge of discrimination. Moreover, there would follow uncertainty in respect to any contracts that might have been made with the town that grew less rapidly. Under the circumstances we did not feel justified in retaining this amendment in the bill.

Amendment No. 48 has reference to the termination of the 50-year period and to the matter of recapture. The House provision was:

Provided, That in the event the United States does not exercise the right to take over and does not issue a new license to the original or a new licensee, then the commission shall issue from year to year an annual license to the then licensee under the terms and conditions of the original license, etc.

The Senate struck out the House provision and inserted the following:

Provided, That in the event the United States does not exercise the right to take over or does not issue a license to a new licensee, or tender a new license to the original licensee, upon the terms and conditions aforesaid, which is accepted, then the commission shall issue from year to year, etc.

Because of the insistence of the House conferees that the language of the Senate provision did not meet with their approval, the conferees agreed to this modification:

Provided, That in the event the United States does not exercise the right to take over or does not issue a license to a new licensee, or issue a new license to the original licensee, upon reasonable terms, etc.

We believe that the use in the Senate amendment of the words "which is accepted" would result in a perpetual license, because all that the original licensee would have to do would be to say to the Government when it tenders terms, "These terms are not accepted; we will not accept them," and simply stand pat. Then, under the act, the Government would have to tender a license from year to year. We struck out the words "which is accepted" and in lieu thereof inserted the words "upon reasonable terms," so that the Government at the end of 50 years could tender reasonable terms to the original licensee, and if he would not accept those terms, proceedings could be begun against the original licensee and his contract terminated.

Amendment No. 49 provides how the charges which are secured in the previous section are to be distributed. There was difference between the Senate and the House with regard to this matter. We finally resolved upon adopting the plan which was adopted in the oil-leasing bill recently enacted by Congress, changing, however, in some degree the percentages, so that 12½ per cent of the charges derived from water-power development are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to be used for the purpose of paying costs of administration; 50 per cent derived from national monuments, national-forest reserves, and the public domain, etc., to go into the reclamation fund; 37½ per cent derived from power development upon national forests, national monuments, and the public domain to be paid to the State in which the power is developed; 50 per cent of the charge derived from the construction of dams upon navigable waters to go into the Treasury of the United States, to be expended for construction and maintenance of navigation dams and for the construction of headwater improvements; the balance, 50 per cent, less 12½ per cent cost of administration, to go to the Treasury of the United States. We compromised the conflicting views of the Senate and House on the matter of distribution of the charge in the manner set forth in the conference substitute.

Amendment No. 57 relates to the "fair value" as the basis for net investment where an existing power plant comes under this new law upon its own application. The House did not have any such provision. We feel that it would be necessary to have some basis of valuation on an existing plant when it comes in under the new law upon its own application, but the latter portion of amendment No. 57 was objected to by the House conferees and was finally eliminated. That latter portion of the amendment has reference to contracts with existing plants, and its purpose was to continue those contracts, not to exceed the license period, even though the power plant which makes the contract goes under this new law. We did not believe that this would be wise. We felt that this would simply make it impossible for the Water Power Commission to change the rates, even though those rates under the existing contracts were not in the public interest.

If these contracts are in the public interest, then the customer has nothing to fear under this law, and if they are not in the public interest there ought to be a regulatory body which could make them in the public interest, and so we say that they should be subjected to the regulatory control of the State authorities where they have such bodies, and if not under the Water Power Commission under the provisions of section 19 of the act.

The last amendment I wish to call attention to is amendment No. 59, and relates to the provisions of the rivers and harbors act of 1917, creating the so-called Newlands Waterways Commission. The amendment was eliminated. The conferees did not believe it was necessary to incorporate that provision in this water-power bill. We believed that we should repeal this provision of the act of 1917 creating the Waterways Commission for these reasons: The President never appointed the commission, notwithstanding the act was passed as far back as 1917. Moreover, many of the powers that were given to the commission we have given to various bodies created in the transportation act of 1920, especially with reference to inland water transportation. Other powers granted in the Newlands Act are contained in this water-power bill. So there was very little left for this commission to do.

Gentlemen, these are in brief the main amendments that have kept the conferees apart for six weeks. This report represents the consummation practically of eight years of contention between the Senate and the House upon water-power legislation. I sincerely trust that the time has come for this law to be put in force, to the end that industry may be promoted and that the prosperity of the country may be advanced. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to use as little time as possible, and I therefore asks unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I could not sign this conference report, but I want to say that while there is much good legislation in the bill there are Senate amendments which are absolutely fundamental, in my judgment, that I have never agreed to, that the House has never approved. But if this bill is sent back to conference I have not a particle of doubt that the Senate conferees will yield as to these objectionable amendments. One of them is amendment No. 8, one other is amendment No. 36. Amendment No. 8 will be discussed as to its effect by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], to whom I expect to yield time for that purpose. Up to 1918 there had been developed water power in the United States to the extent of 6,000,000 horsepower.

I read as my authority for this statement, in the hearings held by the Water Power Committee of the Sixty-fifth Congress, a letter from Mr. H. J. Pierce, as follows:

THE ARLINGTON,
1025 VERMONT AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1918.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
Chairman Committee on Water Power,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SIMS: In response to your suggestion that you would be glad to know approximately how much of the water power already developed in the United States is under Government control and developed through permission of Government, and how much has been developed by private parties independent of Government control, the following figures I believe to be approximately correct:

	Horsepower.
In the national forest	755,000
In the public domain	173,000
Through reservoir development	72,000
Requiring right of way over public lands	1,000,000
In navigable streams	1,000,000
On nonnavigable streams and involving lands privately owned	3,000,000
Total amount of water horsepower developed in the United States	6,000,000

Very truly, yours,

H. J. PIERCE.

In other words, development up to that time, as shown by the Geological Survey, has been exactly half and half as to developments that would come under the provisions of this bill and that would not. There was 3,000,000 horsepower developed upon public lands and navigable rivers requiring the consent of Congress or the Government. There has been 3,000,000 horsepower developed not requiring an act of Congress or the consent of the Government. The definition of "navigable waters" that we carried in the bill that passed this House twice, that was agreed to in conference by House and Senate in the Sixty-fifth Congress, was as follows:

That the term "navigable waters," as used in this act and as applied to streams, shall be construed to include only such streams or parts of streams as are in their ordinary natural condition used for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce, or which through improvements heretofore or hereafter made have been or shall become usable in such commerce.

A majority of the conferees have agreed on the following instead of that definition of "navigable waters," which is Senate amendment No. 8:

"Navigable waters" means those parts of streams or other bodies of water over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and which either in their natural or improved condition, notwithstanding interruptions between the navigable parts of such streams or waters by falls, shallows, or rapids compelling land carriage, are used or suitable for use for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce, including therein all such interrupting falls, shallows, or rapids; together with such other parts of streams as shall have been authorized by Congress for improvement by the United States or shall have been recommended to Congress for such improvement after investigation under its authority.

The definition of navigable waters as carried in the House bill is a natural one, one that is easy to understand, one you know what it means. Here is 3,000,000 horsepower developed up to 1918 by State authority not upon navigable waters as then defined and understood. With the present tendency to extend navigation in very small streams by the use of small motor boats that can carry a hundred pounds of freight, that make regular or irregular trips, such streams can be recommended for improvement by the Government engineers, because they carry that which enters into interstate commerce. Who knows how many millions of this 3,000,000 horsepower development can be put under Government control by simply having the engineers recommend improvements in these small watercourses that never had been used for purposes of navigation?

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I am watching the gentleman's argument in this matter very closely, and I am with him on the committee, and I have heard many of his careful examinations of witnesses. Now, just what is the gentleman's objection to this Senate provision which authorizes the development of streams designated here so that they can be improved and the Government handle them under this bill?

Mr. SIMS. I am trying my best to do that very thing. [Laughter.]

Now, where there is a great interruption like that in the Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River, with two or three hundred miles of naturally navigable water above the interruption and two or three hundred miles of naturally navigable water below the shoals, of course the law ought to apply to both parts of it. But you can make, by artificial improvement under this definition, a navigable stream out of almost any kind of a watercourse or lake or dam if it can be used in part for interstate commerce.

I want you to remember how the definition in the House bill originally came to be in it. The original definition of a navigable stream as adopted by the House in the Sixty-fifth Congress went to the Senate, and Senator CUMMINS offered an amendment defining what navigable waters were, and it was so logical and so reasonable that for one I contended that the House committee should accept that definition, and it was accepted, and so the definition that was in the House bill, which was stricken out in the Senate, was really a former Senate amendment, proposed and advocated by Senator CUMMINS. Now, as there are many thousands of horsepower already developed in the State of Maine and in other States on streams not naturally navigable, but under the provisions of this bill may be so declared, it seems to me you are playing with fire to change this definition that is natural, that is logical, that is easily understood, and put in this "reworked shoddy" provision of the Senate.

Now, as to Senate amendment 36, that has been the bone of contention in every water-power fight we have ever had on this floor and in the Senate. Heretofore Congress passed certain bills; the charge provisions did not suit the late President Roosevelt, and he vetoed them. The Congress passed other bills during the administration of President Taft, and on this very identical feature he vetoed them.

The House provision is to my mind very similar to the House definition as to navigable waters. It is natural, it is reasonable, it is clear. It reads as follows:

That the lessee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commissioner.

Who was the author of the language of the House provision? The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], who was a member of the Special Water Power Committee. That provision was agreed to by the Senate conferees in the Sixty-fifth Congress and was adopted by the House. The licenses to be issued contemplate the use of Government land or permission to develop power on navigable waters. That provision fixed neither a maximum nor a minimum charge. Where a pioneer development is contemplated out in the West, where you want to develop water power for the purpose of attracting settlers, where the demand for power will be small for several years, charge them 1 cent a horsepower for a reasonable time, until the community is built up and the demand increases. But take the great Niagara Falls development, situated practically in the suburbs of Buffalo, where water power is being sold on both sides of the Niagara River—a great stream where no dam had to be built, where no private investment was required, and where power has been sold from that development at Niagara Falls for from $10 per horsepower per annum all the way up to $114 per annum. There stands the great city of Buffalo. Buffalo can not get anything like a fair division of the power produced at Niagara, the power companies having contracted to let the Aluminum Co. have, as I now recall it, 70,000 or 80,000 horsepower per annum and about 40,000 or 50,000 horsepower to other corporations, while Buffalo is given, as I recall it, less than 30,000.

There was an amendment placed on the bill, offered by Senator WADSWORTH, of New York, that required an equitable distribution of power among all those needing power. Why should not a great city like Buffalo, almost on the brink of the Niagara River, obtain its needed power, or at least a fair division of the power produced at its door? These power companies will perhaps apply for new licenses under this law. Why should not the commission have the right to require a just and equitable distribution of power, and give to Buffalo and other cities near enough to utilize it power as cheap as possible, to be used for public utility purposes, instead of giving the Aluminum Co. and other private corporations the bulk of it? Buffalo to-day has the largest steam power plant in the world, about 150,000 horsepower, as I now recall, used to light the city and operate other city utilities, while a great monopolistic private corporation is permitted to utilize at a minimum charge per annum by far the larger volume of the horsepower produced on the American side of the great Niagara Falls. Do you want to vote for a bill that confirms the grip that monopolies already have on these power resources, with no power given to the commission to make these power companies award a certain percentage of this power to Buffalo and other cities or to make among private users an equitable distribution? I want to know why a producer of power at Niagara Falls should not pay a higher charge to the Government than a producer of power at Priest Rapids, in the State of Washington, almost in a desert?

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there anything in this bill that will give municipalities or divisions of the Government any prior rights to lease or establish these water powers or license these water powers?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; if they show equal capacity to do it.

Mr. McKEOWN. A prior right?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; a municipality.

Mr. McKEOWN. Do I understand the gentleman to say there is nothing in this bill by which the control of the power by the private corporation can be exercised—that is, that they can not be ordered to furnish the municipality with the power?

Mr. SIMS. No; the commission can not force an equitable division. You heard the chairman discuss that. He was afraid it would bring about practical difficulty.

Now, why should not the commission be permitted to make a just and reasonable charge, as provided in the present House bill and in the bill that passed the House and was agreed to in conference in the Sixty-fifth Congress, and leave it to the commission to determine what should be a just and reasonable charge be made for each project? One cent might be high enough at one project and ten or fifteen dollars might not be unreasonable at another improvement. These projects are not all public utilities serving cities and municipalities. Private corporations will exercise the right to apply for licenses. Every water power in the United States is already known to gentlemen who will file applications on the best sites almost before the ink gets dry on the President's pen, if he should approve the bill. All the best locations are well known to private interests, who will grab while the grabbing is good. The municipalities will not hear of it perhaps until it is too late. Why should we turn over these valuable national assets while we have the power to refuse them a license except upon conditions and terms that will do justice to the public? Why should we turn over to the Steel Trust, to the Aluminum Co., or any other great corporate manufacturer that wants to develop for the purpose of private profit and not for the public benefit? This conference report as it is ought to be defeated. The bill ought to go back to the conferees with instructions to at least adhere to their disagreement on amendments Nos. 8 and 36.

That the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for the costs of the administration of this act; for recompensing it for the use, occupancy, and enjoyment of its lands or other property; and for the expropriation to the Government of excessive profits until the respective States shall make provision for preventing excessive profits or for the expropriation thereof to themselves, or until the period of amortization as herein provided is reached, and in fixing such charges the commission shall seek to avoid increasing the price to the consumers of power by such charges, and charges for the expropriation of excessive profits may be adjusted from time to time by the commission as conditions may require: Provided, That when licenses are issued involving the use of Government dams or other structures owned by the United States or tribal lands embraced within Indian reservations the commission shall fix a reasonable annual charge for the use thereof, and such charges may be readjusted at the end of 20 years after the beginning of operations and at periods of not less than 10 years thereafter in a manner to be described in each license.

Mr. Speaker, I would like for any man to tell the House, if we are to prefer the public to private interest, in what way does this Senate amendment better serve the public and better protect the interest of the United States than does the House provision for a just and reasonable charge to be fixed by the commission, to be paid by the licensee for the permission of doing for his individual profit a thing the Government has the right, power, and duty to do, if the public interest is to be served rather than the promotion of private, selfish, profiteering, monopolistic schemes for the amassing of great wealth by exploiting the public.

When a would-be developer gets a permit he will have two or three years to get ready, to make financial arrangements, and to make borings, and one thing and another. If a water-power site is improved at the present time, under the present prices for labor and material, what kind of a project would it have to be in order to pay a desirable return on the investment?

This is a leasing bill only in name, because it does not provide a practical, workable method for the Government to resume control of that which it has leased. To admit that it can lease is to admit that it has the right to lease, and to admit that it has a proprietary interest in the thing so leased, and we provide that the Government may take this property back after 50 years by paying the licensee or assign the net investment in the project. Why, the Government will never take one of them back on these terms unless it is during a war and taken for war purposes. Why? Because if you gentlemen and myself should be living at that time, which in all probability we will not, you would not make an appropriation out of the Public Treasury to pay for any kind of a net investment in any project.

So private capital will hold the property indefinitely, perpetually. The original licensee may not hold it, but some other will hold it, because Congress will not make the required appropriation. Therefore, while we provide for recapture, it is only in name, as no recapture will ever take place under this bill. Mr. Speaker, nothing less than compulsory amortization during the period of the lease will ever get back anything for the Government. Do you know what the amortization charge would have to be in order to pay out absolutely every dollar of the investment in 35 years? Only 1 per cent per annum on the actual investment; yet we are giving licensees 50 years and then paying them for the property. Here is the testimony of Mr. Britton, a very able man, who is general manager of the Pacific Coast Gas & Electric Co., of San Francisco, Calif. His company serves about 2,000,000 people, produces and disposes of 164,000 electric horsepower a year, and not one project of it on a navigable stream, and he says that the price that they get for their power is $68 per horsepower per annum, on the average, and that they pay as taxes 5.6 per cent upon the gross receipts, which means about $3.50 a year per horsepower. One per cent more, or 6.6 per cent on gross receipts, would amortize every one of these projects, if they were under the provisions of this bill, in 35 years and would require an additional charge of only 68 cents per horsepower per annum. His company is making money. It is one of the most prosperous companies in the United States, paying in taxes six times the amount that it would take to completely amortize the property of these companies in 15 years less time than the licenses have to run in this bill. Suppose the State of California had been the proprietor, like the Government is, of the public lands and had the power on navigable rivers possessed by the Government and had provided for a compulsory amortization charge of 1 per cent per horsepower per annum. In 35 years the State of California would have owned the whole blessed outfit without having to pay one cent for any part of the investment. No such provision is in this bill.

Too-day through this bill we are parting with the last national resource we have over which we have any power of control. Canada has taken care of her timber. The timber on the public lands of Canada can be sold only by permission of the Dominion Government, and then they send a Government agent to mark the trees that may be taken. They are conserving their forests. We have wasted and destroyed our timber in the United States by having no Government supervision of the forests, either State or national.

The coal mines of the country are fast being depleted because the mining is not scientific, but is wasteful and under no control whatever. Here is the competitor of coal. Water power is the competitor of power produced through the agency of coal, which is going to become more expensive all the time. So far as water power is concerned, the power house and the electric generating machinery do not require very much for maintenance. Transmission lines are different. Now, if we are going to lease these water powers, let us provide that after five years of operation, or some other period of time, after they have passed through the pioneer stage, they must charge 1 per cent per annum as an amortization charge in addition to the charges they are authorized to make for other reasons, and that the Federal and State commissions must provide for it, and at the end of 35 years the Government will own the projects absolutely, with no suit to bring or one additional dollar to pay in order to retain these great water-power rights and possibilities, or do we want to give them away? The question is with us to decide now or it will be forever too late.

Mr. Speaker, Senate amendment No. 44 reads as follows:

The licensee hereunder shall not directly or indirectly discriminate or permit discrimination in the apportionment, allotment, transmission, distribution, sale or lease of power or electrical energy or current in favor of any municipality as against any other or others in respect of service, rates, or the quantity of power or electrical energy or current transmitted or supplied to it or them; but the licensee shall fairly and equitably apportion, allot, transmit, and supply power, elecrical energy and current among and to such municipalities as can be efficiently served and supplied directly or indirectly by the licensee in proportion, so far as practicable, to their respective populations, industrial or commercial importance and prospects, needs and requirements, so as best to subserve the public interests. This condition shall be binding upon every person, association, and corporation receiving power or electrical energy or current from the licensee and enaged in developing, transmitting, distributing, selling, or leasing power, electrical energy or current to any municipality or to its inhabitants, and shall inure to the benefit of such inhabitants. Every contract, agreement, or understanding between the licensee and such person, association, or corporation shall be expressly subject to and limited by the provisions of this subsection. This condition may be enforced and regulated by the commissions or other agencies mentioned in, and in the manner and to the extent prescribed by, section 19 of this act.

I was strongly in favor of yielding to the Senate as to this amendment, as was also Mr. HAUGEN, and I shall in my motion to recommit instruct the House conferees to yield and agree to this amendment. It is a just and proper provision to have in the law.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the conferees that finally, after these many years of effort, a water-power bill has been reported that both branches seem to have agreed upon. It is of particular interest to my section of Massachusetts that cooperation can be arranged between private owners and the Government for the use of the water power on navigable streams. The subject has been very thoroughly discussed on this floor, and I am sure the report of the conferees will meet with the hearty approval of the people in my section. [Applause.]

I can add nothing to the details of the discussion of the relations between private corporations desiring to generate power and the interest of the Federal Government in increasing the use of navigable streams. Before I was a Member of Congress the Connecticut River above Hartford was the outstanding example of this form of cooperation.

The increased cost of fuel, the lack of power, and the need of additional transportation facilities have greatly augmented the previous strong arguments made in behalf of transportation on this stream. Within a very compact area about Windsor Locks, Conn., are centered industries which would quickly absorb the 40,000 horsepower now running to waste down the Connecticut River.

Navigation to Springfield and Holyoke, Mass., by a limited Federal appropriation would mean material reduction in cost of fuel and raw material. Under the bill the conferees to-day report, private enterprise can combine with Federal appropriation by which the natural resources will be utilized and navigation made possible. May this bill soon become law and thereby end an effort of many years' standing in behalf of navigation on the Connecticut River.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, after nearly 10 years of controversy, during which adverse interests have fought to secure the incorporation of their ideas into legislation, a conference committee of the two Houses of Congress has finally agreed upon and reported out a water-power bill which constitutes one of the best examples of constructive legislation of recent years.

Up to the present time water powers on the navigable rivers have been administered by the War Department, on the national forests by the Department of Agriculture, and on the public lands by the Department of the Interior. Under the provisions of the bill now agreed upon all water powers over which the United States has any jurisdiction will hereafter be administered by a commission composed of the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture, a measure by which duplication of work may be avoided, a common policy pursued, and the combined efforts of the three departments directed toward a constructive national program of intelligent economical utilization of our water-power resources.

Under the terms of the bill the public retains complete control of water-power rights on the public lands and in the navigable rivers. No development can be made by any agency other than the United States itself, except under the authority of and in accordance with the provisions of a license issued by the commission. Any lands of the United States proposed to be used for power development are to be automatically reserved for such purposes as soon as application is filed, and the title to such lands will be forever reserved to the United States. Existing laws which provide for a different disposition of water-power rights are to be repealed.

The first right to develop any power project rests in the United States, and this right may be exercised at any time for any purpose that Congress may approve and to any extent that it may appropriate funds. The bill provides that if the commission shall find that the power available at any Government dam may be advantageously used by the United States itself, or that any specific project should be developed by the United States, it shall not approve any application by any other agency, but shall report to Congress with recommendations for Government construction. At the expiration of any license the United States retains the right to take over and thereafter to maintain and operate the properties of any licensee upon payment of an amount which shall in no case exceed the original cost of the property and which, on account of the provision for amortizing original cost out of earnings in excess of a specified rate, may in many cases be much less than such cost.

The United States further reserves the right to take over at any time for purposes of operation any plant under license upon the payment of an amount to be determined by condemnation proceedings; and finally, in time of public danger, upon order of the President, the United States may take possession of any project and operate it for any purpose involving the safety of the United States.

In the development of water powers by agencies other than the United States, the bill gives preference to States and municipalities over any other applicant, both in the case of new developments and in case of acquiring properties of another licensee at the end of a license period. Furthermore, no charges are made for licenses issued to these agencies in so far as the power developed is sold to the public without profit or is used for State or municipal purposes.

Whenever licenses are issued for developments by private capital, full public control is retained over the construction, maintenance, and operation of the project. Plans and specifications of all structures and the general scheme of development must be approved by the commission, which has authority to require the best practicable utilization of any site applied for. Construction must be started within two years of issuance of license and must proceed to completion at a rate prescribed by the commission. Failure to begin or to complete construction within the time specified subjects the license to cancellation.

Licensees must maintain their power plants and other structures in good repair and efficient operating condition, and must set aside annually out of earnings a sum sufficient not only for current maintenance but for replacing any structures or equipment that may become worn out or obsolete. They also must so operate their works as not to interfere with navigation and must, upon request, furnish power for lighting and operation of locks. They must at all times conform to reasonable regulation concerning the maintenance of reservoir levels and the discharge of water through the plant in order to maintain satisfactory conditions of navigation.

Licensees are required to maintain a system of accounting in a form to be prescribed by the commission, to permit examination of their books or records at any time, and to submit such statements concerning their business as the commission may require. This provision of the bill will make it possible to keep a continuous check upon the expenditures of a licensee and will enable the commission to know at all times the amount of money which has been invested in the property.

The bill provides that the regulation of rates, of service, and of issuance of securities shall be exercised by the several States whenever they have established agencies with the necessary authority. If local agencies do not exist, the Federal commission is given jurisdiction to act, upon the request of any State, or of any interested person, or on its own initiative. In rate-fixing proceedings no valuation can be claimed by the licensee in excess of the actual cost of the properties used in the development of power.

Licenses issued to private or corporate applicants will require the payment of annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission for the purpose, first, of paying the costs of administration of the act; second, for recompensing the United States for the use or enjoyment of its lands or other property; and, third, of absorbing any excess profits that may be earned by licensees. Charges for this last purpose will be collected only until the several States have made provision for preventing excessive profits or for taking over such profits for themselves or until a provision of the bill which requires that excessive profits shall be used for retiring the cost of the property becomes effective. In fixing annual charges the commission shall avoid naming an amount which would result in increasing prices to consumers. Of the charges collected on account of the use of public lands one-half are to be paid into the reclamation fund, three-eighths to the States, and one-eighth into the United States Treasury. One-half of the charges collected on account of licenses on navigable rivers are to be reserved as a special fund to be spent by the Secretary of War in the maintenance and operation of navigation structures or in the construction of headwater improvements on navigable rivers. The remaining half of charges from this source are to be paid into the Treasury.

The bill provides that whenever any licensee is benefited by the construction by another of a storage reservoir or other headwater improvement the commission shall require the licensee who is thus benefited to reimburse the owner of the reservoir or other improvement for a fair share of the annual charges for interest, maintenance, and depreciation. This provision will be a direct encouragement to the construction of storage reservoirs and will result in the conservation of flood waters, the regulation of river discharge in the interests of navigation, and the prevention of flood damage as well as in the development of water power.

The feature of outstanding public importance is the basing of property values upon cost. Under present conditions whenever public agencies seek to regulate rates for services or to acquire private property for public use, the valuations are likely to include not only the original cost of the properties but appreciation in land values, franchises, "going value," and every other element, tangible or intangible, that the ingenuity of owners or of their attorneys can devise. Every licensee under the new bill will, as a provision of his license, enter into a contract with the Federal Government never to claim anything in excess of actual cost when his properties are valued for purposes of rate making, and even this amount will be reduced to the extent that reserves have been accumulated out of excess earnings for the purpose of retiring a part of the cost. This same method of valuation will be employed in determining the prices to be paid for the property at the end of the license period if it is taken over by the United States or if any State or municipality exercises its preference right to acquire the properties for public use.

It is believed that this legislation will protect the public against excessive charges for power and at the same time is sufficiently liberal to encourage development by the States, municipalities, individuals, and corporations; that within a reasonable time dams will be built and storage reservoirs constructed which will prevent the untold loss of millions of dollars by disastrous floods and give the Nation at a minimum cost cheaper power for lighting our cities and homes and to drive the machinery of our industries.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the Public Lands Committee for nearly 12 years, and during nearly all that time we have had a water bill before us. We have spent many, many months of hard and patient work upon it, and it is needless to say that this final act is a great relief to some of us. I feel that this is one of the most important and far-reaching bills and really great pieces of constructive legislation that Congress has enacted in many years. [Applause.] Fortunately there is no politics in the bill. Both political parties are entitled to great and equal credit for enacting it. It has been a most tedious, difficult, and often exasperating task. Even after its special water-power committee was created some two years ago and all these bills referred to it, I know from being on that committee that the work has been long and trying, and I am exceedingly glad to have taken a humble part toward this final adjustment of a policy that will affect this and future generations in this country. I wish we could be endowed with the foresight to see the defects of this bill as our posterity will see them 50 years from now. We can only say to our heirs and descendants that we have earnestly and conscientiously tried, first, to fully and thoroughly protect the Government and the rights of the people against monopoly and extortion, and to provide for good service at fair rates, and, secondly, to draft a law that will encourage and fairly protect investments in water-power development, and it is my earnest hope and prayer that we have accomplished both of these objects. If we have, the committee will for generations to come be entitled to the thanks of the American people. The possibilities of the water-power development of this country are beyond the imagination of any living human being. We already have the richest and greatest Nation the sun has ever shone on, and when all our streams are properly harnessed the power possibilities and industrial development that it will bring about are beyond human calculation at this time.

We need fear no competition so long as we keep a level head. As I listened a few minutes ago to the bitter and impassioned speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] against the prohibition constitutional amendment, and heard his reference to other countries, I thought to myself, "Let other nations revel in drink and scoff at us if they want to; but history will record that sober America beat a drunken world." We will not only compete with but distance every nation on earth and the more liquor they consume the easier it will be to outstrip them. The marvelous resources of our country, handled by educated, intelligent, sober, energetic, ambitious, and patriotic Americans, will make our country exceed all others in a geometrical proportion in the coming years, and this bill, together with the hundreds of other splendid constructive measures that have been enacted by Congress during the past few years, will very greatly aid in that future development and glory of our beloved and glorious country. [Applause.]

S. 3716. An act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine and report upon the interest, title, ownership, and right of possession of the Yankton Tribe of Indians, South Dakota, to the Red Pipestone Quarries, Minnesota.

S. 3307. An act authorizing the Ottawa and Chippewa Tribes of Indians of Michigan to submit claims to the Court of Claims;

S. 4047. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to make an allotment to Pessa, a member of the Comanche Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma;

S. 3164. An act authorizing the Northern Arapahoe Tribe and the Northern Cheyenne Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims; and

S. 3774. An act to authorize the coinage of a Roosevelt 2-cent coin.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 4311. An act to authorize the addition of certain lands in the Caribou National Forest; and

H. R. 9781. An act to amend section 217 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McCORMICK, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. SIMMONS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WATER POWER.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, like my good friend from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who has been on the Committee on Public Lands and the Water Power Committee, that has had this legislation under consideration, I have been on the same committees with him and have seen similar legislation pass the House at three different times in prior Congresses. I was on the special water-power committee of the last Congress and attended the committee hearings, which gave great consideration to this bill; also on the same Committee on Water Power which reported this bill. This is a nonpartisan bill. To my mind it gives the best judgment of the Members of the House and the members of the committee and the conferees for the purpose of proper development of the great water powers of the United States, both as to navigable and nonnavigable streams, and properly looks after irrigation; both interests are protected.

I take a good deal of delight in finding in this bill one of the provisions that was uppermost in my mind during the two months of hearings, developed thoroughly and completely, that in addition to the development of water power we should not overlook the utilization of our water resources for irrigation. The conference committee has retained that in the bill after it was placed there by the Senate, so that we may get the highest use for irrigation and for water-power development. I believe the country should be congratulated on the near completion of this vitally important piece of legislation. There is sure to follow this legislation much improvement and development of our water resources. It is not, perhaps, perfect in every part. Some may criticize some particular feature, but I do believe that it protects the Government, that it gives an opportunity for a large and proper development under proper safeguards.

And then it provides for the recapture after 50 years' use, so that we are not yielding or deeding away, if I may use that expression, in perpetuity these valuable rights. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I have a very keen appreciation that in marshaling judicial opinions and in any effort to discuss the legal phases of legislation pending before the House, there is danger of quickly clearing the Chamber of such few Members as are still here, but because of my conviction that it is useless to talk about this measure in general terms, and because of my hope that out of an attempted analysis of certain portions of the bill some helpful suggestions may come to the House, I propose to make what by courtesy may be called a legal argument.

I must support the promised motion to recommit this conference report. I do so for the particular reason that, in my opinion, the definition of "navigable waters" agreed upon violates settled principles of law and the rights of States and of individuals.

Let me direct attention to my objection to the report. The words "navigable waters" do not appear in the Federal Constitution. Congressional jurisdiction over a stream within a State must rest upon that article of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." In these words is the sole grant of power and in their fair intendment is the limitation upon our right to exercise control over the rivers and waters of a particular State. Our authority is for the specific purpose named and can be asserted for none other. What constitute "navigable waters" of the United States over which Congress may exercise power in each instance and in the last analysis is for the Supreme Court to determine. Legislative definition therefor is unnecessary. Such definition is justified only if its purpose is to place a restriction upon the full exercise of our rights; it is futile and foolish when the language employed goes beyond the rule and the reason for it, as declared by the final judicial authority. And that is what we here seek to do.

What are "navigable waters" of the United States? What is the rule which must be applied in determining whether a particular stream comes within our jurisdiction? Cases in which the question has been discussed are many, but in them all the principle which must guide is clearly recognized.

In the Daniel Ball (10 Wall., 557), the court said:

> Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law, which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways of commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

In the Montello (20 Wall., 430), the court accepted navigability of the river in its natural state as the proper test, and said:

> If it (the river) be capable in its natural state of being used for purposes of commerce, * * * it is navigable in fact and becomes in law a public river or highway.

And again it lays down the proposition that—

> The vital and essential point is whether the natural navigation of the river is such that it affords a channel for useful commerce.

The case quotes with approval the language by Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts (21 Pickering, 344), in which he asserts that it is not—

> Every small creek in which a fishing skiff or gunning canoe can be made to float at high water which is deemed navigable, but in order to give it the character of a navigable stream it must be generally and commonly useful to some purpose of trade or agriculture.

And through the years the principle laid down in these early cases has been followed. The measure is the use or the susceptibility of use of the stream in its natural condition for useful commerce.

In United States v. Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. (174 U. S., 690), the court limited the definition in this language:

> The mere fact that logs, poles, and rafts are floated down a stream occasionally and in times of high water does not make it a navigable river.

This case emphasizes the requirement that we must look to the ordinary and natural condition of the stream and to its natural availability for substantial commerce.

The case of United States v. Brewer-Elliott Oil & Gas Co. (249 Fed. Rep., 615), states the essentials of the rule with unusual clarity. I quote from the opinion:

> The issue of navigability is one of fact. * * * A river is not navigable unless so in fact. It will be deemed navigable when used or susceptible of use in its ordinary condition as a highway of trade and travel in the customary modes on water. * * * The exceptional use of a stream for purposes of transportation in times of temporary high water or "the mere fact that logs, poles, and rafts are floated down the stream occasionally * * * in * * * high water does not make it a navigable river." To meet the test * * * a watercourse should be susceptible of use for purposes of commerce or possess a capacity for valuable floatage in the transportation to market of the products of this country through which it runs. It should be a practical usefulness to the public as a public highway in its natural state and without the aid of artificial means. A theoretical or potential navigability, or one that is temporary, precarious, and unprofitable, is not sufficient.

In Donnelly v. United States (228 U. S., 262), we find the rule expressed thus:

> The question of the navigability in fact of nontidal streams is sometimes a doubtful one. It has been held in fact that what are navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the act of Congress in contradistinction to the navigable waters of the States depends upon whether the stream in its ordinary condition affords a channel for useful commerce.

One of the recent cases on this subject, and the last to which I shall refer in this connection, is United States against Cress, Two hundred and forty-third United States, page 316. I quote:

In Kentucky * * * numerous cases have arisen where it has been necessary to draw the line between public and private right in waters alleged to be navigable, and by an unbroken current of authorities it has become well established that the test of navigability in fact is to be applied to the stream in its natural condition, not as artificially raised by dams or similar structures; that the public right is to be measured by the capacity of the stream for valuable public use in its natural condition; that riparian owners have a right to the enjoyment of the natural flow without burden or hindrance imposed by artificial means, and no public easement beyond the natural one can arise without grant or dedication save by condemnation with appropriate compensation for the private right. * * * We have found no case to the contrary. * * * Many State courts * * * have held, also, that the legislature can not by simple declaration that a stream shall be a public highway if in fact it be not navigable in its natural state, appropriate to public use the private rights therein without compensation. * * * This court has followed the same line of distinction.

The opinion then cites with approval some of the cases hereinbefore mentioned by me and later in the opinion reaches the conclusion—that the servitude of privately owned lands forming the banks and bed of a stream to navigation is a natural servitude, confined to such streams as in their ordinary and natural condition are navigable in fact and confined to the natural condition of the stream.

I invite the House to test the definition of "navigable waters," which you are asked to approve, by the rule of these cases. This conference definition, which is the Senate definition, in substance, divides into three parts. It first declares "navigable waters" to be—those parts of streams or other bodies of water over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States—and which either in their natural or improved condition, notwithstanding interruptions between the navigable parts of such streams or waters by falls, shallows, or rapids compelling land carriage, are used or suitable for use for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce, including therein all such interrupting falls, shallows, or rapids.

Why this addition to the definition? Is this language used for the purpose of restricting the general terms immediately preceding or is it an effort to extend authority? If the former, if intended to be restrictive, why use the general language at all? Why not omit this comprehensive language and limit our definition in terms to the restricted class of streams? The answer is that this second part of the definition does not restrict. Its effect, if it can be given effect, is to enlarge the definition.

The word "and," connecting the two parts of the definition, does not take from and limit what goes before. A proper construction of this portion of the definition makes navigable those streams which either in their natural or improved condition are used or are suitable for use in interstate or foreign commerce. It is an assertion that the condition of a stream as improved measures its navigability in law. It announces a principle sustained by no court. The references to shallows, to falls, and to rapids compelling land carriage and the inclusion of such obstructions to navigation within so-called navigable waters also condemns the definition. It asserts to be navigable streams which experience, reason, and fact declare are not navigable.

The balance of the definition is manifestly unwarranted. It declares "navigable waters" to mean those parts of streams or other bodies of water over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States—together with such other parts of streams as shall have been authorized by Congress for improvement by the United States or shall have been recommended to Congress for such improvement after investigation under its authority.

This is a brazen effort to extend our jurisdiction beyond its constitutional limits. It first undertakes to make navigable in law streams for which Congress has appropriated money for improvements and, next, those streams which the Board of Engineers of the Army or the waterways commission, created under this act, may recommend for improvement. Henceforth neither the Constitution nor the decisions of our Supreme Court nor the facts as to navigability are to be the basis for jurisdiction or are to affect the manner or the degree in which we shall exercise our authority. The language does not even require the improvement first to be made. We declare streams to be navigable which we authorize or some one else recommends for improvement without any regard to the present condition of the stream or the existing facts as to navigability.

But it is interesting, even though it may not affect our action, to make brief reference to a few decisions of our courts which bear directly on this proposal. The cases already quoted, in holding that the test of navigability applies to streams in their ordinary and natural condition, by plain implication deny the suggestion of this last part of the Senate definition that the opinion of Congress expressed by an authorization for improvement, or the recommendation of any body that an improvement be made, can change the character of the stream.

But we do not need to rely on inference. Text writers and the courts have expressly held that navigability in law can not be created by artificial means.

Kenney, volume 1, page 570, discussing navigable waters, writes:

A stream which can only be made navigable or floatable by artificial means is not a public highway.

In People v. Economy Light & Power Co. (241 Ill., 290), quoted with approval in Two hundred and forty-second Federal Reporter, 560, the rule is thus stated:

To hold that a State can by artificial means make a stream navigable which in a state of nature was not navigable, and thereby deprive riparian owners of their property rights in the bed of the stream, is simply to hold that private property may be taken for public use without compensation.

In United States v. Brewer-Elliott Oil & Gas Co. (249 Fed. Rep., 615) the court in discussing what constitutes navigability holds that a watercourse should be susceptible of use for purposes of commerce or possess a capacity for valuable floatage in the transportation to market of the products of the country through which it runs, and further says:

It should be of practical usefulness to the public as a public highway in its natural state and without the aid of artificial means.

And the same principle is sustained in United States v. Cress (243 U. S., 316), in these words:

By an unbroken current of authorities it has become well established that the test of navigability in fact is to be applied to the stream in its natural condition, not as artificially raised by dams or similar structures.

This decision further says:

Many State courts, including the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, have held also that the legislature can not by simple declaration that a stream shall be a public highway, if in fact it be not navigable in its natural state, appropriate to public use the private rights therein without compensation. * * * This court has followed the same line of distinction.

This distinction and the principle which these cases point out is founded in sound sense. If we admit that a stream may become navigable in law through such means as are set out in the last four lines of this Senate definition, then we substitute the judgment or the whim of Congress and of engineers for fact and accepted rules of law. I can not admit that Congress by artificial means, by skill of engineers, in expenditure of large sums of money appropriated therefor, can make a nonnavigable stream navigable and thus create jurisdiction which otherwise it would not possess. Admit that Congress may of right do this, and it follows that there is no stream within the whole United States which may not be thus brought under congressional control. I oppose the adoption of this conference report with the Senate definition included and urge its return to the conferees, because I will not support a proposition so clearly without authority in law. I would oppose it if this definition could be sustained in law, for it would then constitute an extension of Federal control in a manner and to a degree which must retard water-power development within our States. No State has done more than Maine in the scientific conservation and utilization of her natural resources. If our State and people may be let alone, we will meet the demands of the future. We do not want our progress impeded by the delays and inefficiencies incident to Federal interference with and control over our nonnavigable streams, our industries thereon, and our people. [Applause.]

I favor this motion to recommit this conference report to the conferees with instructions to them to insist upon the House definition of "navigable waters" for the added reason that by the acceptance of this definition we will minimize a further offense in the legislation. It is true that the bill by its title declares it is for the purpose of creating a commission to provide, among other things, for the improvement of navigation, and there is enough in the body of the bill to justify this reference in the title to the improvement of navigation, but no man who studies this act can resist the conclusion that the improvement of navigation is but incidental to, if at all connected with, the substantial purpose of the act. It is but the haze behind which is hid the substance. Stripped of its covering, the proposal relates not to commerce between the States or with foreign nations, but it authorizes a commission to issue licenses to corporations and to individuals to build dams and to erect power houses for the generation of electricity for industrial purposes. And in this purpose may be found the explanation of the strained effort to enlarge the definition of "navigable waters" beyond its proper limits. The proponents of this legislation are not concerned with navigation and so with navigable waters in fact. Theirs is a scheme of power development for the demands and the profits of industry under Federal control. They recognize the impracticability of such developments upon streams navigable in fact and in law, except under unusual and exceptional conditions. The natural and customary location of these developments is upon streams broken by rapids and falls, upon streams unused and useless for commerce, and in the recognition of this truth we find the reason for the effort to declare navigable and so within Federal jurisdiction those streams and those parts of streams down which in their ordinary and natural condition trade and commerce have never been carried between the States or with foreign nations. Limit this definition of "navigable waters" as we may and the bill even then will go to the very verge of constitutional inhibition. I know of no authority in our fundamental law for the licensing by Congress of corporations and individuals for the building of dams, the erection of power houses, and the generation of electricity for industrial and commercial purposes. There are those who profess to believe that this may be done upon navigable streams as an incident to the improvement of navigation. Whether this view be sound or not, it is clear in my mind that such powers can not be exercised by the Federal Government within the limits of our States upon streams which are not navigable and over which Congress has no jurisdiction. The excess of zeal on the part of the proponents of this legislation tends to obscure and to jeopardize that which is meritorious in it. The legislation must be regarded as but another manifestation of the growing and alarming tendency of the Government to absorb and to regulate the rights and activities of States and of individuals.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine in concluding his argument, as a summary and the result of all he has said, made the bald statement that power is developed and can be developed in the United States on streams that are not navigable, and that it is not developed on navigable streams.

That is a broad general statement. Let us test this by facts. The greatest water power in the world is on the Niagara River. Is it navigable in fact or not? As a result of the gentleman's conclusion, we must necessarily find that it is not navigable. Let us examine the facts and see. To-day they are locating on the upper Niagara some of the greatest steel plants in the world, and by deepening the river they are making it possible to carry on plants on the lower part of the upper river that have existed there for 20 years or more. Below Tonawanda, only just above and out of the sound of the thundering cataract, they are paying $5,000 a day to labor in the steel plant, and all of its manufactured products are carried away and all of its raw material is brought to it by the navigation of the Niagara. Therefore, so far as the navigation of the Niagara is concerned, we find that it not only has been navigated for a generation, but we find that its use for navigation is growing day by day, year by year, until there is growing up there to-day a separate and independent region of industry, one of the great regions of industry in all this broad land of ours. Let us take the lower Niagara, let us go below the cataract and see whether that is navigable in fact. From the earliest days, as long as we have had a country, the lower Niagara has been the connecting link between the upper Lakes and the lower Lakes, and even down to the ocean. Boats start there, and while the same boats do not go down to Montreal and the ocean, they connect with these other boats and carry their tonnage all of the way, and there is not a day in the season when you can not go up there and see the boats running back and forth, hour in and hour out. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] brought all his argument down to one conclusion, that you could not have water power on a stream and in that same stream have navigability for commercial purposes, and it takes one example only, as I say, of the Niagara, where there is the greatest power in the world, and where you have navigability at both ends of the river, to utterly destroy the basis of his argument. The fallacy of his argument is demonstrated by the very best example that you can use.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, it is very unfortunate that under the procedure of this House one is obliged or required, almost, to swallow a conference report, and it is especially distasteful in a matter of such importance as that which is now before us. Any legislation that is passed by us should have in mind as its end the conservation of the interests of the people of the United States. This bill does not to my mind go to that end. An amendment was introduced in the Senate which required a licensee to distribute the power developed by it among the communities in its vicinity without any discrimination, and that has been stricken out.

I am primarily interested in the great water power at Niagara Falls. We are now developing upon the American side practically 250,000 horsepower. That is developed by one company, because to one company has been given all of the water that is permitted to be diverted from the Niagara River for power purposes. That company uses most of the power that is developed by it upon its own lands. It has several thousand acres of land, and it has established upon that land manufactories to which it sells the power that is developed by it, so that the surrounding community, the other communities along the Niagara River, do not receive any benefit from the Falls of Niagara. In fact the city of Buffalo receives from the Niagara Falls only 27,000 horsepower out of 254,000.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. How much does Buffalo get from the Canadian plant?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It does not get any, as I understand it.

Mr. ESCH. I understood that it had 60,000 horsepower from the Canadian side, making a total of 87,000 horsepower that is obtained.

Mr. MACGREGOR. None of it goes into the city of Buffalo; it all goes to the Lackawanna Steel Plant, which is not in the city of Buffalo.

The recent report of Col. Warren, division engineer, which has now come to the river and harbor board, recommends that the treaty which now exists between the United States and Great Britain, with reference to the diversion of water, be amended, and if amended it will probably permit the diversion of 80,000 cubic feet of water development at Niagara Falls, dividing between the United States and Canada 40,000 on each side. The report recommends that a canal be constructed from the river above the Falls on the American side down to the gorge, where there is a drop of 300 feet. That will develop, according to the estimates, one and a half million horsepower on our side of the river. For the effective development of the power the license should be granted to one concern, and there should be thrown around it the safeguard that the company that is given the license can not acquire large tracts of land in the immediate vicinity and rear up a manufacturing community which shall inure to its own benefit to the exclusion of the surrounding communities.

The amount of power that is capable of being developed at Niagara Falls is almost inconceivable to the ordinary individual. Taking both sides of the river together there will be developed 3,000,000 horsepower. The total water-power development of the United States at the present time, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], is 6,000,000 horsepower. The requirement of coal for the production of 3,000,000 horsepower would be 18,000,000 tons. The total tonnage capacity of the railroads of the United States is 96,000,000 tons. It would require for transportation 360,000 coal cars. It is estimated by the United States engineers that electric power could be delivered at the switchboard at $19 per horsepower as against $50.70 for steam power. It is not necessary for me to point out what that means to the Niagara frontier, and it should be conserved for the benefit of the people of the Niagara frontier and not simply to enrich a single corporate interest to which this license will be granted.

It is contended that under this act the public-service commission of the State of New York would have power to make regulations. I very much doubt that. In fact, a very great question could be raised about that, because under section 6 it is provided that—

> Each such license shall be conditioned upon acceptance by the licensee of all of the terms and conditions of this act, and such further conditions, if any, as the commission shall prescribe in conformity with this act.

Under section 19 all of the conditions that are prescribed are—

That as a condition of the license, every licensee hereunder which is a public-service corporation or a person, association, or corporation owning or operating any project and developing, transmitting, or distributing power for sale or use in public service, shall abide by such reasonable regulation of the services to be rendered to customers or consumers of power, and of rates and charges of payment therefor—

It does not say a word in the bill with reference to distribution. It does not say that the licensee shall distribute the power among the communities in the vicinity in an equitable manner, and I doubt very much whether in the face of the provisions of this bill any public-service commission could be given the right to make any such regulation.

The industrial development of the Niagara frontier, which is the center of 15,000,000 people, depends upon a proper distribution of the immense quantity of cheap power that can be developed by the falls, and it is to this Congress to see to it that the rights of the citizens in general are protected. The power belongs to the people in general and the people should have the benefit of it. It should not be granted in such a manner that the result will be the enrichment of one individual or corporation. There should be a wide distribution of it, so that there may be a widespread enjoyment of this great gift of nature.

It is true, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has said, that there is now coming into the United States from Canada some 60,000 horsepower, but very little if any of that goes to the city of Buffalo. Part of it goes to the city of Lackawanna and part of it goes down the State as far as Syracuse, lighting the cities and running the street cars of Syracuse, Rochester, and I think Oswego.

That power is liable to be cut off at any time. The Canadian authorities contend that they have the right to prohibit its export at any time and I think there is considerable logic in their argument. If they do that then the cities of Rochester and Syracuse and various other communities would be deprived of power unless provision is made for distribution from the development on the American side. If the licensee is permitted to make such use of the power developed according to its own desire and should make use of it upon its own property or in the immediate vicinity then the general public would be deprived of a right that they are entitled to. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, with the adoption of the conference report on the water-power bill this Congress shall have placed in the way of final enactment another great constructive measure. The consideration of this bill carries us back to the days of Roosevelt and Taft, for it was during the administration of those two great Presidents the sentiment crystallized for Federal legislation regulating and controlling in the interest of all the people of the country water-power development and the creation of hydroelectric energy. Many have grown weary in the long-continued effort to secure legislation of this character, and yet perhaps it is just as well that the Congress has not sooner legislated on the subject, for every time measures of this character have been considered they have been improved. Each time the committees of the Congress and the Congress have considered water-power legislation they have improved it. This may not be a perfect bill, but it is a better bill than any of its predecessors. Its enactment will bring a fulfillment of the dreams, desires, and efforts of those who have earnestly labored for constructive progressive legislation of this character. This Congress has much helpful, beneficial legislation to its credit. We have made a wonderful record so far for economy and carefully considered appropriations. We will, we hope, before this session closes bring about the enactment of further constructive legislation, but I think that nothing that the Congress has done and nothing that it will do will reflect greater credit upon it than the passage of the water-power bill. [Applause.] Some of our friends may think only of what they consider its faults. I am sure that no law was ever placed upon the statute books entirely lacking faults, but this measure is remarkably free from faults, and it will aid tremendously in the development of the water-power resources of the country, and in a way that will be of benefit and advantage to all the people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] to explain a certain matter.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, so far as the development at Niagara is concerned, I was in entire accord with my colleague in respect to the Wadsworth amendment and went to the Senator and suggested that it be placed in the bill. However, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said, we are in this position: We have reached a state where we can have a water-power bill. By its provisions there must be an efficient development. At Niagara, instead of 240,000 horsepower, through this bill we will get about 400,000 horsepower at the cataract and by a new development a half million horsepower in the gorge. It will be an enormous advantage to the whole frontier, and the city of Buffalo will stand a much better chance to get the horsepower it needs when there is 750,000, three-quarters of a million, horsepower to distribute than it does now with only a quarter of a million horsepower to divide. On that account, because of the wonderful advantage it will be to the frontier, to Buffalo, as well as the rest of the frontier, and to the whole country, I am for this bill.

If we send the bill back to conference, we can not tell whether we would get a bill at this session or not. Congress has debated, the two Houses have been in dispute, for so long that we can not afford to take the chances of further delay.

All the time we have debated the water has been running to waste, coal has had to be mined and transported to take its place, and the railroads, which ought to have been carrying other things, have been swamped with coal to make power for our factories.

We have considered no greater reconstruction measure than this, none that will conserve our natural resources more, end the congestion on our railroads, and lower the high cost of living. It will be of lasting and of constantly increasing benefit. Not a pound of coal should be used where water power can be had to take its place, and there can and will be no considerable development of water power without the passage of such a measure as this.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I have only one more speech on this side.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall offer a motion to recommit the conference report to the conference committee with instructions to further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendments Nos. 8 and 36, and to agree to Senate amendment No. 44.

Senate amendment No. 8 is the amendment put on in the Senate defining "navigable waters," which will be fully discussed both from a legal standpoint and otherwise by the very able gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE]. Amendment No. 36 is the charges provision, which in the House bill are to be just and reasonable, with absolute power to make the charge high or low as the circumstances that each project may require, demand, or permit. Then the further instruction to agree to Senate amendment No. 44 is for the benefit of the people of any community, or any industry, which will be discussed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR]. Mr. Speaker, if the motion to recommit is agreed to, I have not the slightest doubt that if the Senate sees that we are in earnest about it and mean what we say, that the instructions of the House will be agreed to and leave the bill just as good as it was when it passed the House. Now, I beg to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], one of the ablest men in the House and personally well acquainted with the situation at Buffalo, that the adoption of amendment 44 would not prevent the developing of three-quarters of a million horsepower at Niagara Falls. With the Wadsworth amendment in the bill, it will not prevent them from developing to the fullest extent, but it will require an equitable distribution of that three-quarters of a million horsepower so developed. Now, it can not hurt the bill to adopt the Wadsworth amendment. It could not hurt the Niagara Power Co., or whatever company may develop additional power, but it would prevent discrimination in favor of private corporations as against municipalities and public utilities. Why not put it in? What objection has any gentleman of this House got to a proposition of that sort? Senator WADSWORTH, from New York, is also a very able man, and the Senate agreed to his amendment. If we recede from our disagreement to that amendment, it becomes a part of the law.

Now, why does this House want to deny to Buffalo and to those other municipalities within reach of Niagara Falls what is perfectly clear that they ought to have? The responsibility for such denial will not be mine, because all we have to do is to go back and recede from our disagreement on the Wadsworth amendment, No. 44, which will not in the least retard Niagara Falls development. But by so doing we will give the people there what they are entitled to have, equal and just treatment and the opportunity to have an equal pro rata of power that may result from further development. What objection have the Members of the House to it? There can be no reasonable objection to it. There may be some undisclosed possible water-power user that wants to grab more than a just and reasonable proportion and hopes to get it from the company that may apply and get the license if the Wadsworth amendment is finally defeated. If I had the power, I would make it a part of the license itself, with forfeiture if violated.

Now, we can make that amendment absolutely certain by simply yielding our disagreement to Senate amendment No. 44. By yielding we will give the public a fair, square opportunity to at least have an equal division in the benefits which the Government of the United States authorizes the licensee under this law to do, and without such authority no further development can be made at Niagara Falls.

Mr. Speaker, there was another Senate amendment that I was very anxious to have in the bill in full, just as it passed the Senate, which amendment is No. 27, known as the Norris amendment, as it was offered by Senator NORRIS.

Amendment No. 27 is as follows:

The commission is hereby authorized and directed to construct or cause to be constructed on the Potomac River the power plant outlined in project No. 3, House document No. 1400, Sixty-second Congress, third session, including each and every detail and plan outlined and specified in said document or any of the exhibits, plans, and specifications attached thereto. And for such purpose the commission is hereby authorized to construct said project under its direct supervision or to enter into contracts for materials and labor for the construction of the same or any part of the same as in its judgment may be the most practical and economical, not exceeding a limitation of cost for all the items connected with and mentioned in said project, of the sum of $25,000,000: Provided, That the commission may, from time to time, modify or change any of the plans or specifications in said document as it may deem advisable or practicable for the better carrying out of the purposes of this legislation, and if in the judgment of the commission the object to be attained by said project can be better or more economically brought about it is hereby authorized to change the location of said dam or to build two or more dams instead of the one specified in said document.

And the commission is hereby authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise a suitable site for said dam or dams and for all other real estate necessary to the carrying out in detail of said project, including all real estate that will be overflowed by the formation of the lake mentioned in said project. And whenever in any case the commission is unable to acquire by purchase at a fair value any land, property, or property rights necessary to be acquired in the carrying out of said project, it is hereby authorized and directed, in the name of the United States, to begin and prosecute to final adjudication all necessary suits for the acquisition of such property in any court having jurisdiction.

In the construction of said project a separate account shall be kept of the expenditure necessary on account of the increased water supply for the city of Washington and the expenditure on account of the power development.

Mr. Speaker, there is pressing necessity for an increased water supply for the District of Columbia. Senator NORRIS, as also Senator NELSON, thought that by utilizing the Great Falls in the Potomac River, so near this city that both the need for additional water supply and for much-needed hydroelectric power both for Government and city uses might be combined and result in great economy to both the city and Government. So the Senate adopted the Norris amendment, which I think was a very wise provision. Of course, the Senate conferees had to stand by that amendment. But a majority of the House conferees agreed to the Senate amendment with an amendment as follows:

The commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and, on or before the 1st day of January, 1921, report to Congress the cost and, in detail, the economic value of the power plant outlined in project No. 3, House Document No. 1400, Sixty-second Congress, third session, in view of existing conditions, utilizing such study as may heretofore have been made by any department of the Government; also in connection with such project to submit plans and estimates of cost necessary to secure an increased and adequate water supply for the District of Columbia. For this purpose the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

I hope that action will be taken immediately upon the approval of this bill as provided in the substitute amendment just read, so that as soon as Congress convenes for the December session this much-needed water and power supply project for the benefit of the Government and the District of Columbia may be authorized and appropriated for at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. Speaker, I had known in a general way that the Washington Railway & Electric Co. had owned, or claimed to own, for a number of years what is known as the Great Falls power site, which it afterwards sold and conveyed to the Potomac Electric Power Co. for $1,000,000 of its stock. I do not know just what property is included in this so-called power site, but I suppose it will be necessary for the Government to secure this property by purchase or condemnation, if the purpose of the Norris amendment is ever carried out. Several years ago Congress passed what is called the public utilities law. Under the provisions of this law a Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia was established. Under this law the Public Utilities Commission was authorized to ascertain by methods designated the values of the property of the several public utility companies serving the city of Washington and the District of Columbia; and the said law also provided that any public utility being disssatisfied with the value thus fixed by the commission on its property might by a proceeding in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the commission have any order of the commission thus made modified or vacated, if found unlawful, inadequate, or unreasonable. The Public Utilities Commission under said law proceeded, as provided therein, to fix the value of the property of the said Potomac Electric Power Co. The said power company, as authorized by said act of Congress, did file a bill in the said supreme court to review the findings of the commission. All proper proceedings were had in said equity suit, and the same was finally decided by said court on the 2d day of March, 1920, Justice Ashley M. Gould delivering the opinion of the court. I beg the indulgence of the House to read the following excerpts from the opinion of the court bearing somewhat on the action of the power company in the acquiring of this power-site property, and as to the financing operations of the power company:

The power company also claimed that it had a right to the allowance, as part of the historical cost of its property, of the sum of $1,000,000, representing what it paid in its stock for certain water rights at what is known as the Great Falls power site. It is a significant fact that these rights to this nonproductive property were not only previously acquired by the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and held by it for 12 years before it transferred them to the power company, but that title, up to the time of the hearing in this case, had not been perfected, either in that company or in the power company. It is also worthy of notice that shortly before the public utilities law was enacted the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and the power company, acting through identical boards of directors, consummated a transaction by which these rights were transferred to the power company for $1,000,000 of the stock of the latter company. This power site is located outside the District of Columbia. It has never been used for the purpose of supplying power to those who use electric current in the District of Columbia, nor is there a scintilla of evidence in the record that it ever will be so used by the power company. Its actual value is problematical, and the ability of a private owner of power rights at this site to develop them is further complicated by the larger Federal Government's interest therein. No witness who claimed to have any knowledge on the subject testified as to what the value was. For these reasons there was no justifiable theory upon which the $1,000,000 of stock issued for it by the power company could be treated as an actual value of $1,000,000 upon which the power company would be entitled to collect revenue from its patrons in the District of Columbia. The commission therefore did not err in excluding it, either as an item in the historical cost of the property, or in the reproduction cost, or in its finding of fair value.

The power company also claimed under the head of preliminary and organization expenses and as a part of the historical cost the sum of $550,000, representing that amount of the capital stock of the power company issued to Messrs. Crosby & Lieb for their services on behalf of the company in obtaining loans from the United States Mortgage & Trust Co. amounting to between $400,000 and $700,000, the testimony being somewhat obscure as to the exact amount of the loan, and also for their services in securing a contract for power with the Eckington & Soldiers' Home Railway Co. At the time of these transactions Crosby & Lieb were the owners of practically the entire capital stock of the power company, and voted to themselves this $550,000 of stock as a commission for negotiating the loan and securing the contract. In the issue of the stock they designated that it was for "extraordinary services." It does not appear from the evidence that the contract they secured, whatever may have been its nature, was of any value, and when it is considered that the sum of $109,750 was paid by the power company for discount and commission in securing the loan it is impossible to understand upon what theory this stock issued to Crosby & Lieb can be justified as a proper part of the historical cost of the power company. At the time they were practically the sole owners of the stock of the company and were among its officers and directors, and whatever services they performed were not only not extraordinary but were clearly within the line of their duty as such officers and directors. The principle of law which prevents a person standing in a fiduciary relation from making a profit at the expense of his cestui que trust is too well established to justify me in making citations to support it. Under the evidence as to this transaction the commission was justified in excluding this sum in its ascertainment of the historical cost of the property.

Mr. Speaker, the opinion of Justice Gould is very able and illuminating and one of the most exhaustive discussions of the questions involved and raised in the case referred to, in which he sustained each and every act and decision of the Public Utilities Commission, and I feel justified under the permission given me to extend my remarks to include same in full. It will be most valuable and instructive to all Members of the House in any further legislation that may be had bearing on the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

OPINION OF THE COURT.

This is a bill in equity, filed by the Potomac Electric Power Co. (Inc.), plaintiff (hereinafter called the power company), against the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia (hereinafter called the commission), for the review of this court of the findings of the commission as to the value of the property of the power company.

The jurisdiction of this court attaches by reason of the provisions of paragraph 64 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913, which provide that any public utility being dissatisfied with any order or decision of the commission fixing any valuation, rate or rates, tolls, charges, schedules, joint rate or rates, or regulation, requirement, act, service, or other thing complained of may commence a proceeding in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the commission, as defendants, to vacate, set aside, or modify any such decision or order on the ground that the valuation, rate or rates, tolls, charges, schedules, joint rate or rates, or regulation, requirement, act, service, or other thing complained of fixed in such order is unlawful, inadequate, or unreasonable.

Pursuant to this provision of the law, the company has filed its bill in this court to review the findings of the commission. The law further provides that such proceedings shall be decided and determined as are all equity proceedings in this court.

Paragraph 69 of the act provides that in all trials, actions, and proceedings arising under the provisions of this section or growing out of the exercise of the authority and powers granted therein to the commission, the burden of proof shall be upon the party adverse to such commission or seeking to set aside any determination, requirement, direction, or order of said commission to show by clear and satisfactory evidence that the determination, requirement, direction, or order of the commission complained of is inadequate, unreasonable, or unlawful, as the case may be.

In the instant case, the opinion and findings of the commission in the matter of the valuation of the property of the power company, filed May 2, 1917, contain 105 printed pages, and it is this opinion that the court is called upon to review. The record of oral testimony taken by the commission contains 6,221 pages in nine volumes; the testimony of one expert on the part of the power company (Harold Almert), bound in four volumes, contains 1,234 pages; the findings of other experts are of equal length; and the brief of one of the counsel for the plaintiff contains 557 pages, exclusive of appendices.

No brief of testimony, as required by the equity rule of this court, has been filed by either party. The result has been that this court, at most exacting expense of time and labor, has been compelled to read practically the entire record, as well as the voluminous briefs.

A thorough review of the work done by the commission in this case serves to emphasize the wisdom of applying to its findings the rules laid down by the United States Supreme Court in determining the weight to be given them. In April, 1914, the commission organized a valuation bureau to assist in the task of ascertaining the amount of money expended in the construction and equipment of the plaintiff company; that is to say, what is generally described as the historical cost of the utility, and also the amount of money it would require to replace all of the physical properties belonging to the power company, which measure of value is commonly known as the reproduction cost.

The accounting division of the commission, whose duty it was to ascertain the historical cost, was under the immediate direction of Mr. Andrew Sangster, of Chicago, a certified public accountant, as chief accountant. Mr. Sangster made a report on the historical cost of the power company, which is in evidence, and subsequently testified before the commission, and was cross-examined by the counsel for the power company at great length in regard to the items which made up the historical cost of the property of the plaintiff company.

The ascertainment of the reproduction cost was under the immediate direction of Mr. Charles L. Pillsbury, a consulting engineer, as chief engineer employed by the commission. The work of inventorying the property was begun on June 1, 1914, and was continued throughout 1914 and the first half of 1915. The report of Mr. Pillsbury upon the reproduction cost is also in evidence as an exhibit in this case; he further testified before the commission and was cross-examined at great length by counsel for the power company.

Copies of both of these reports, namely, those of Mr. Sangster and Mr. Pillsbury, were transmitted to the power company on the 18th day of May, 1916, and the company was notified that on the 26th day of May, 1916, the commission would proceed to a valuation of its property in accordance with the law. On the latter day the oral hearings on the valuation commenced.

At the outset the power company objected to the consideration of the reports of the commission as a prima facie ascertainment of the valuation to be placed on its property. Whereupon the commission assumed the initiative and offered for cross-examination the witnesses who had compiled the above-mentioned reports. On July 21, 1916, an adjournment was granted by the commission until September 15. From that date until October 26, 1916, the cross-examination of Mr. Sangster and Mr. Pillsbury continued by the counsel for the power company.

The power company then put upon the stand Mr. Harold Almert, of Chicago, a consulting engineer, who submitted in evidence his report on the cost of reproduction of the company's property. Other witnesses also testified on behalf of the company. The case was finally submitted to the commission for decision on January 21, 1917.

Mr. Almert's report on the cost of reproduction of the company's property, including all claimed intangible elements of value, consists of 1,234 pages of typewritten matter comprised in four volumes.

It will thus be seen that the investigation by the commission on the one side as to the valuation of the property of the company, together with the presentation by the company of its claim as to such value, covered a period of substantially two and one-half years.

It is not unreasonable, therefore, that the court should attach to the findings of the commission in this case all the weight that has been attached to such findings under the decisions of the Supreme Court and the other courts.

It may be added that the power company submitted no complete statement of the historical value of its property; or, in other words, the amount shown by its books to have been invested in the property, although Mr. Ham, an official of the company, discussed at length that value as shown by the books of the company.

At the outset of the consideration of the important questions involved, it is necessary to ascertain with exactness the jurisdiction possessed by this court under the statute. It does not admit of question that any rule laid down by the Supreme Court in similar cases should be followed by this court.

In the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (222 U. S., 541) the Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding whether the Interstate Commerce Commission had exceeded its power in fixing a rate on lumber, said:

"In determining these mixed questions of law and fact the court confines itself to the ultimate question as to whether the commission acted within its power. It will not consider the expediency or wisdom of the order, or whether, on like testimony, it would have made a similar ruling. 'The findings of the commission are made by law prima facie true, and this court has ascribed to them the strength due to the judgments of a tribunal appointed by law and informed by experience.' (Ill. Central Ry. Co. v. I. C. C., 206 U. S., 441.) Its conclusion is, of course, subject to review, but when supported by evidence is accepted as final; not that its decision, involving, as it does, so many and such vast public interests, can be supported by a mere scintilla of proof; but the courts will not examine the facts further than to determine whether there was substantial evidence to sustain the order."

So in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. (227 U. S., 88, p. 100), the court said:

"The order of the commission restoring a local rate that had been in force for many years and making a corresponding reduction in the through rate was not arbitrary, but sustained by substantial though conflicting evidence. The courts can not settle the conflict nor put their judgments against that of the rate-making bodies."

Probably no case emphasizes the point involved more emphatically than People ex rel. the New York & Queens County Gas Co. v. McCall (219 N. Y., 84). There the company declined to obey the commission's order because the extension of its gas mains and services required of the company by the commission would not yield more than 2½ per cent. The company began a suit in the supreme court of the State to have the order of the commission declared unreasonable. The supreme court decided against the commission, asserting the right to say "whether the extension ordered was a reasonable extension." The court of appeals reversed the appellate division, ruling that this assertion was erroneous, because "the court has no power to substitute its own judgment of what is reasonable in place of the determination of the public commission; it can only annul the order of the commission for the violation of some rule of law."

As to why the judgment of the commission should predominate over that of the court, the court of appeals pointed out that the commission was created to perform important functions in the community with reference to the regulation of the utilities, and that the commissioners were expected to have peculiar capacity for dealing with the complex problems presented by the activities of public-service corporations.

This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States under the same title in 245 U. S., 337, the court saying:

"This interpretation of the statutes of New York is conclusive, and the definition, thus announced, of the power of the courts of that State to review the decision of the public-service commission, * * * differs but slightly, if at all, from the definition by this court of its own power to review the decisions of similar administrative bodies, arrived at in many cases in which such decisions have been under examination." (Citing cases.)

While the greater number of the cases deciding the question were rate cases, the principle is equally applicable to valuation cases. Perhaps no case ever before the courts involved the same necessity of a clear recognition and application of it to the findings of the commission as the instant case.

The limitation of the court's rights to review the findings of the commission, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, renders a detailed discussion of the evidence in the instant case unnecessary, even if it were practicable, and a general analysis of the decision of the commission will be sufficient to indicate the grounds upon which my conclusions are based.

It may be stated, however, quite broadly that if the testimony adduced as to the value of the power company's property by both the witnesses for the latter and for the commission was to be weighed as in an ordinary civil case, I would find not only that the conclusions of the commission as to the historical value of the property were sustained by substantial evidence, but by a preponderance of the evidence. This conclusion does not include certain specific items which the power company claims should have been included in making up the value of its property, and which were excluded by the commission, as to which the evidence is not in substantial dispute, and where the conclusion of the commission might be said to be a matter of law. Such of these items as are important will receive separate consideration hereinafter.

Some question was made in the argument by one of the counsel for the plaintiff, the power company, as to the character of the valuation which the public utilities law directed to be made. There is no doubt in my mind that the valuation contemplated by that law was one for the purpose of determining rates and services. Section 2 of the law provides:

"That every public utility doing business within the District of Columbia is required to furnish service and facilities reasonably safe and adequate and in all respects just and reasonable; the charge made by any such public utility for any facility or service furnished or rendered, or to be furnished or rendered, shall be reasonable, just, and nondiscriminatory. Every unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory charge for such facility or service is prohibited and is hereby declared unlawful. Every public utility is hereby required to obey the lawful order of the commission created by this section."

It is self-evident that the only method by which the commission could determine whether a charge was reasonable or unreasonable, or whether a service was adequate or inadequate, was by determining the fair value of the property upon which the utility had a right to receive a reasonable return, and this was done by the commission.

It was insisted by counsel for the power company that the Washington Railway & Electric Co., by virtue of its ownership of all of the stock of the plaintiff and of certain contractual relations alleged to exist between it and the power company, and because it had guaranteed certain obligations of the power company, had a right to be made a party defendant in the cause; it also was insisted on behalf of the power company that a proper construction of the act of Congress of June 5, 1900, entitled the Washington Railway & Electric Co., by reason of the ownership of the stock of the power company, to have electric-light rates fixed with reference to deficiencies in the earnings of the Washington Railway & Electric Co. Neither of these contentions can be sustained. The public utilities law in specific terms made it the duty of the power company to furnish its services at a reasonable cost, and that reasonable cost is to be determined, according to repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, by the return which the power company is entitled to receive upon the fair value of its property, and the amount of this return is not to be affected by the financial needs or difficulties of another corporation, performing a dissimilar service, even if the latter is the owner of the entire capital stock of the power company. In addition to this, the act of Congress of June 5, 1900, specifically prohibits the Washington Railway & Electric Co. from acquiring or owning the whole or any part of the property or franchises of the power company. For these reasons the commission did not err in refusing to permit the Washington Railway & Electric Co. to become a party respondent, nor did it err in holding that the duty of the power company under the law was to furnish its services at a reasonable cost to consumers regardless of its connections through stock ownership or otherwise with any other public utility.

The fair value to be found by the commission under the terms of the public-utility law for rate-making purposes, in my opinion, and I so find, means the actual, necessary, and reasonably true investment in money or its equivalent made by the utility for the purpose of the exercise of the public duty it owes under the public grant which it enjoys. This investment covers the cost of the property used and useful in its operation, the reasonable value of any property dedicated to it by private persons for this public use, and such unearned increment from its property holdings of real estate as may have accrued to it through any general rise in real estate values. It covers and includes every legitimate expenditure made and properly chargeable to its capital account, provided it has written off all property that has ceased to exist or passed from use from any cause and depreciation has been properly provided for. A public utility is not, and under the law can not be, considered in the nature of a speculative enterprise. The persons, whether as individuals or as partners or in a corporate form, are under no obligation to themselves or to the public to invest their capital in any public utility. Having done so, however, they have under the law and by a principle which was announced by Lord Hale in England centuries ago the right to a fair return upon their actual investment, and to nothing more. If risk and danger be attached to the enterprise at its inception, the law gives them the right to a larger return because of the risk encountered, but not the right to a larger valuation for this reason, and when the period of risk is passed and the enterprise is safely established the law reduces the rate of return to a fair and reasonable percentage upon the fair value of the property, to be ascertained upon a consideration not of the rights of the investor in the utility alone, but upon the rights of the public, whose patronage is the prime factor in the success of the enterprise. In my opinion, there is no other just and reasonable principle upon which a rate base can be determined in the case of a fairly normal utility operating under fairly normal conditions. These conclusions are to be read, in one form or another, in repeated decisions of the United States Supreme Court, beginning with Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113), which has well been called a "landmark in the law." In language oft quoted, Chief Justice Waite uses this oft-repeated language:

"Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created."

The method of ascertaining fair value depends upon circumstances, and frequently, as in this case, the ascertainment of the historical cost of the property is combined with its reproduction cost, less depreciation, and these are considered in the light of those other elements of value specified in Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 466) and other decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

As previously stated, the commission, through its accountants and engineers, made a prima facie ascertainment of the historical cost and an estimate of the reproduction cost of the physical property of the plaintiff, and used the same as a basis upon which to begin its hearings as to the valuation of the power company's property, and took upon itself the burden of putting in evidence by competent testimony these ascertainments and estimates made by its accountants and engineers. In this procedure there was nothing of which the power company could justly complain. The record discloses not only that the power company in no wise assisted the commission or its officers or assistants in making these ascertainments and estimates, but it indulged in a system of negative obstruction far from commendable; and while it may not have actually concealed the truth in any instance, it certainly put itself to no pains to advise the commission of any facts relative to the extent, location, or cost of its property.

A great deal was said in the argument with reference to certain eliminations, amounting to $144,285.75. This amount is the residue of a considerably larger sum representing the cost of many items of property which, from the evidence, had disappeared from the tangible property of the power company or had become no longer used nor useful. It appears that the commission, after weighing the power company's claims for the restoration of the entire amount originally eliminated by the commission's accountant, did restore the larger portion, leaving the $144,285.75 referred to. These eliminations were justified by substantial evidence, and when it is remembered that the fair value of the property of the plaintiff as found by the commission as of July 1, 1914, is more than $1,300,000 greater than the amount found by its accountants as the undepreciated historical cost of the property, and over $1,000,000 in excess of the commission's finding for the same item, it will be seen that no injustice resulted from this action of the commission.

Another item which the commission refused and properly refused to allow in the historical cost of the power company's property was the sum of $1,977,150.63, being the amount added on the books of the power company to the cost of the property at the time of the absorption of the United States Electric Lighting Co. by the power company.

It appears from the testimony that on the 30th day of September, 1902, the balance sheet of the United States Electric Lighting Co. showed its cost of plant and equipment to be $2,081,959.75, to which was added certain construction expenditures charged to surplus account, in the sum of $279,465.79, making its total plant and equipment cost the sum of $2,361,425.54. This property was transferred to the power company and written on its books as costing $4,338,576.17. The property account was thus inflated in the sum of $1,977,150.63, for which stock was issued. This inflation of the property account of the power company was accomplished by means of a so-called sale of the property of the United States Electric Lighting Co. to the power company. At the time of this transaction, the Washington Railway & Electric Co. was the sole owner not only of all of the stock of the Potomac Electric Power Co., the plaintiff, but of all the stock of the United States Electric Lighting Co., and the boards of directors of the latter companies were identical. Of course, no lawyer would argue for a moment that this transfer amounted either to a valid contract or sale. The common saying that "it takes two to make a bargain" has an absolutely unshakable foundation in law; because it has been held in repeated cases that it takes two parties to make a contract. (Gorham's Admr. v. Meacham's Admr., 63 Vt., 231.)

By means of this so-called sale, conceived, conducted, and closed by identical boards of directors, the cost of the United States Electric Lighting Co. to the power company was made to appear on the books of the latter at $1,977,150.63 more than was actually paid. The power company now seeks to capitalize this amount and to exact a return upon it. Regardless of the fact that it is exceedingly doubtful whether the United States Electric Lighting Co. had the legal right to divest itself, without legislative authorization, of the property which it was using in the public service, this attempt to inflate the book value of the property of the United States Electric Lighting Co. above the actual cost to the power company and charge such increase against the public ought not to be permitted from the standpoint either of law or justice. If this excess amount actually represented anything, it represented an attempt to capitalize, as against the public, the privilege or franchise to use the public streets of Washington for a public purpose which had cost the United States Electric Lighting Co. nothing, so far as the evidence in this case shows. The commission, therefore, did not err in refusing to countenance this transaction, and properly disallowed this item.

The power company also claimed that it had a right to the allowance, as part of the historical cost of its property, of the sum of $1,000,000, representing what it paid in its stock for certain water rights at what is known as the Great Falls power site. It is a significant fact that these rights to this nonproductive property were not only previously acquired by the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and held by it for 12 years before it transferred them to the power company, but that title, up to the time of the hearing in this case, had not been perfected, either in that company or in the power company. It is also worthy of notice that shortly before the public utilities law was enacted the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and the power company, acting through identical boards of directors consummated a transaction by which these rights were transferred to the power company for $1,000,000 of the stock of the latter company. This power site is located outside the District of Columbia. It has never been used for the purpose of supplying power to those who use electric current in the District of Columbia, nor is there a scintilla of evidence in the record that it ever will be so used by the power company. Its actual value is problematical, and the ability of a private owner of power rights at this site to develop them is further complicated by the larger Federal Government's interest therein. No witness who claimed to have any knowledge on the subject testified as to what the value was. For these reasons, there was no justifiable theory upon which the $1,000,000 of stock issued for it by the power company could be treated as an actual value of $1,000,000 upon which the power company would be entitled to collect revenue from its patrons in the District of Columbia. The commission, therefore, did not err in excluding it, either as an item in the historical cost of the property, or in the reproduction cost, or in its finding of fair value.

The power company also claimed that it had a right to have included in its property to be valued as a part of its historical cost what is known as Graceland Cemetery, the valuation claim of which was $116,155.80. The evidence in the case discloses that this property had never been used for the purposes of the power company; that it had been acquired for the benefit of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., and was in fact, at the time of the hearing, being used for street railway purposes so far as it was being used for any purpose whatever. The commission excluded this property in its finding of fair value, and in doing so committed no error.

The claim of the power company to have capitalized $201,174.42 representing unamortized debt discount and expense was properly disallowed by the commission. A careful examination of the opinions of experts who have made a study of the accounts of public-service corporations convinces me that this is neither a proper charge to cost of property nor to cost of operation, but that it should be taken care of in the fixing of rates to be charged by the power company in such a manner that it will finally disappear.

The order of the commission shows that it carefully considered, so far as the historical cost is concerned, all amounts expended for engineering and superintendence, general administration, interest during construction, and similar overhead charges shown by the books and records of the power company. The findings of the commission show that as to some of these items more was allowed than its accountants had included in their reports. After weighing the evidence on both sides, which was to an extent conflicting, the commission exercised its judgment as to the proper amounts to be allowed, and as its conclusions were based upon substantial evidence they will not, as already stated, be disturbed.

The power company also claimed under the head of "Preliminary and organization expenses" and as a part of the historical cost, the sum of $550,000, representing that amount of the capital stock of the power company issued to Messrs. Crosby & Lieb for their services on behalf of the company in obtaining loans from the United States Mortgage & Trust Co. amounting to between $400,000 and $700,000, the testimony being somewhat obscure as to the exact amount of the loan, and also for their services in securing a contract for power with the Eckington & Soldiers' Home Railway Co. At the time of these transactions Crosby & Lieb were the owners of practically the entire capital stock of the power company and voted to themselves this $550,000 of stock as a commission for negotiating the loan and securing the contract. In the issue of the stock they designated that it was for "extraordinary services." It does not appear from the evidence that the contract they secured, whatever may have been its nature, was of any value, and when it is considered that the sum of $109,750 was paid by the power company for discount and commission in securing the loan, it is impossible to understand upon what theory this stock issued to Crosby & Lieb can be justified as a proper part of the historical cost of the power company. At the time they were practically the sole owners of the stock of the company and were among its officers and directors, and whatever services they performed were not only not extraordinary but were clearly within the line of their duty as such officers and directors. The principle of law which prevents a person standing in a fiduciary relation from making a profit at the expense of his cestui que trust is too well established to justify me in making citations to support it. Under the evidence as to this transaction the commission was justified in excluding this sum in its ascertainment of the historical cost of the property.

It is unnecessary to go into further details with reference to the commission's findings of historical cost. Many of the claims made by the power company were the result of an apparent attempt to rewrite its books and charge to its capital account items which it had for many years reported to Congress as operating expenses, and others were mere estimates based on some arbitrary percentage assumed on one or two years' operations as what might have been overhead charges included in operating expenses. These claims were unsupported by any direct testimony that such expenditures had actually occurred, and I find no ground upon which the commission's conclusions as to these matters should be disturbed.

It was strenuously contended by counsel for the power company that the commission in making its estimate of reproduction cost as of July 1, 1914, committed error; that the reproduction cost should have been taken as it was by Almert, the expert for the power company, in his report as of July 1, 1916. To this I can not agree. Reproduction cost less depreciation is but one of the elements of value, and in my judgment ordinarily only a negative element, to be considered in the final determination of fair value. Its use is to throw light upon the actual amount invested, and this can only be done where the reproduction cost is determined as of a fairly normal period. It would lose all value if made as of an abnormal period when prices were abnormally low or high. To be of any assistance or real use, it must be made as of a normal time, and the unit cost applied thereto should extend over a sufficient number of years to show a normal trend of prices. To quote the language of former Justice Charles E. Hughes, acting as referee in the case of Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (July 24, 1918):

"To base rates upon a plant valuation simply representing a hypothetical cost of reproduction at a time of abnormally high prices due to exceptional conditions would be manifestly unfair to the public, and likewise to base rates upon an estimated cost of reproduction far lower than the actual bona fide and prudent investment because of abnormally low prices, would be unfair to the company. This question of taking the hypothetical reproduction cost under abnormal conditions as a rate base should, of course, not be confused with the necessity of recognizing actual cost of operation, even though abnormal. A public-service corporation is entitled to be reasonably compensated for its service, and the actual cost of its operations must always be taken into consideration in determining whether or not it receives a fair compensation above that cost. But it is a different thing, after cost has been defrayed, and the question is as to the compensation to be allowed in excess of cost, to take as the basis for a compensatory return an asserted plant value, far above the actual investment, which is reached merely by expert estimates of a cost of reproduction under abnormal conditions. This would result in allowing a public-service corporation to take advantage of a public calamity by increasing its rates above what would be a liberal return not only on actual investment, but upon a normal reproduction cost, in the view that unless it could make an essentially exorbitant demand upon the public it would be deprived of its property without due process of law. The enforcement of the constitutional guaranty does not require the application of any artificial formula. It has constantly been pointed out that the rate base must be what is called 'the fair value of the property,' and that as to this there must be a reasonable judgment based on a proper consideration of all relevant facts." (Citing many cases.)

The date adopted by the commission in this case was as near a normal date as it was perhaps possible to get; the unit costs applied to the inventory were determined after a consideration of the trend of prices given by the witnesses and the commission added 5 per cent to the entire reproduction cost of the physical property as found by its engineers. As already indicated by the quotation from the opinion of Judge Hughes, the fact that prices of labor and material on account of the war in Europe advanced to great heights with a rapidity and to an extent never before experienced from about the 1st of January, 1915, to the time of the valuation has no bearing whatsoever upon the cost of reproduction as a factor in a valuation of rate-making purposes. The commission would have committed a grave error, unjust to the public and destructive of the value of the reproduction cost as an element in a valuation case of this character, to have attempted to find normal prices based upon either current prices as of July 1, 1916, or upon normal prices then or thereafter, as claimed by the power company. Such a course would have greatly impaired the reproduction-cost estimate as one of the elements of fair value. The adoption by the commission of the date of July 1, 1914, as to which the inventory was to be made and normal unit prices applied was reasonable and proper, and its action in so doing has the sanction of the highest legal and engineering authorities.

It is unnecessary to analyze the findings of the commission as to the cost of preliminary operation, financing, preorganization expenses, brokerage and commission, and kindred items, so far as reproduction cost is concerned. These hypothetical costs, based upon an hypothetical reconstruction of the property, the commission allowed for in its final finding of fair value in such sums as under the evidence in the case and the exercise of reasonable judgment it thought proper, and I find no error in its conclusions in this respect.

There was a wide disparity between the witnesses for the commission and those for the power company in regard to the amounts to be allowed for interest and taxes during construction. This resulted from the fact that the commission's engineers conceived the erection of this hypothetical plant upon one basis and the engineers of the power company upon another basis, and the time of construction adopted by the engineers of the power company was two years longer than that of the commission's engineers. The determination of the questions involved in this particular was for the good judgment and discretion of the commission, and in its exercise no reversible error appears. The testimony was conflicting as to what allowance should be made for working capital and supplies, and as the finding of the commission was based upon substantial evidence I have neither the right nor the disposition to substitute my judgment for that of the commission.

The power company claimed as an item of reproduction cost the sum of $650,000 for "compensation to conceivers." This claim also is derived from a percentage applied by the power company's engineer, Almert, to his reproduction cost of the physical property. It is a purely hypothetical cost, based upon the hypothetical reconstruction of the property and is asserted upon the theory that some such amount might be required to be paid to some promoters or conceivers as compensation for the suggestion that a plant similar to that of the power company's should be constructed in Washington under the assumption that the existing plant was nonexistent either on the 1st of July, 1914, or on the 1st of July, 1916.

It appears from the evidence that the power company is not the company which established and developed the electric light and power business of the District of Columbia. The United States Electric Lighting Co. developed this business and at the time it was taken over by the power company it was the result of slow evolution from a very small initial concern, and it is exceedingly unlikely that any cost whatsoever in the nature of a conceiver's commission or a promoter's commission attached to the enterprise. The business was developed slowly but successfully for 15 years before its acquisition by the power company, and there is not the slightest evidence in the record that any such cost was ever paid by it. To hold that the public is to be charged with such an amount, which is a pure figment of the imagination, unsupported by any evidence, is without justification either in law or fair dealing, which latter the public utility owes to its patrons. The commission properly disallowed this item.

In the estimate made by Almert, the engineer of the power company, a claim of $2,115,323 was made for what he called development costs, under his reproduction theory. This figure was arrived at by applying an arbitrary percentage to his reproduction cost of the physical property of the power company. The theory upon which such a claim was based seems to be that during a certain period of the power company's existence it must have incurred losses incident to the expansion of its business, either by obsolescence caused by change of construction or advancement of the art or because of securing the patronage which it now has. While it is true that such costs might attach under a purely hypothetical construction, yet when they are claimed as a basis upon which consumers are required to pay, not a hypothetical but an actual return, there should be at least some evidence that they actually did occur in the existing plant. The records of the power company show that the net earnings of the United States Electric Lighting Co. up to the time of its acquisition by the power company and of the combined companies since that time have been more than sufficient to cover any such claim. All costs of attaching the business, so far as they were shown by the books and records of the power company, were allowed, and no actual expenditure appears in the testimony upon which a claim could be granted. The commission in considering the question of development losses took the position that there was no justification for the large claim made by the power company, yet that it was proper to make some allowance for this element of value in its final finding of fair value, and that it made such allowance is evidenced by the fact that in its final finding of fair value as of July 1, 1914, it allowed $1,137,157 more than the cost of reproduction less depreciation found by its engineers.

The power company further claimed that it had a right to include in the present fair value of its property the sum of $2,500,000 for what it designated as its easements in the public streets. Whether the privilege to use the public streets which the power company possesses should be called a franchise, a privilege, or an easement, is of no consequence. The power company claims that its actual occupation and use of the streets under this privilege gives it an easement therein, and gives to this easement a separate and distinct value which it has a right to capitalize as against the public.

To claim that these so-called easements which cost the power company nothing, without which it could not perform its public duty, and which it is allowed to exercise to enable it to do so, can be capitalized against the consumer of its product in any sum whatsoever, is to make the public use destructive of the public right and effect a result which should not be tolerated by any judicial tribunal. Without passing upon the question as to whether or not these so-called easements would be property rights if the property of the power company were to be condemned and taken by public authorities, or if the power company, being thereunto authorized by Congress, should effect a sale of its property to another company, it is sufficient to say that there should be no capitalization of an item of this character in a valuation made for the purpose of determining rates.

Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of almost, if not every commission and court which has passed upon the question, it was necessary for the commission to consider the actual depreciation of the property at the time of the valuation. It did so consider it, and although the power company's expert, Almert, testified that percentages and amounts both as to age, life, and residual value of the different parts of the property were approximately fair, yet the commission found that the actual depreciation should be materially less than that found by its engineers.

Fair value for rate-making purposes is necessarily expressed by some amount, and this amount, or fair value, constitutes the rate base. The objection that the commission was finding "a fair amount" and not a "fair value for rate-making purposes" is without force, as the terms as used by the commission are similar in meaning and effect.

The final result of the work of the commission in its finding of fair value as of July 1, 1914, was to fix that value as of that date at an amount $1,300,000 greater than that found by its accountants as the historical cost of the property and $1,137,000 greater than the cost of reproduction less accrued depreciation as found by its engineers. It found the fair value as of July 1, 1914, at $10,250,000 and added thereto at the actual cost thereof all net additions to capital from that time up to the date of the valuation, determining the fair value as of December 31, 1916, to be $11,231,170.43. The commission valued the property as a going concern (as) in successful operation. In my opinion, its procedure was logical, lawful and without prejudice to the power company, and that its conclusions were reached after careful and impartial consideration of all the evidence and data before it, and should be sustained.

I therefore overrule all exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the rulings of the commission during the course of the hearing and all exceptions to the findings which have been insisted upon before this court and direct that a decree be entered dismissing the bill of complaint herein exhibited.

ASHLEY M. GOULD, Justice.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, if I were given the right to draft a water-power bill covering navigable streams, the bill that I would write would contain about one paragraph. It would provide that the applicant for a right to a dam or to divert water upon a navigable stream should show to the Secretary of War that his proposed project would in no way interfere with navigation.

The rest of the right and the power I would leave to the States upon the navigable streams, for I am firmly convinced that the people of the several States own the water in the navigable streams. They own all the privileges attached thereto, just the same as they own the fish in the stream, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court, as they own the sand and the rocks in the bed of the stream, as they own the oysters in the bays and ocean within the 3-mile limit, as they own the sponges growing within the 3-mile limit; all of this subject to the paramount right of the Federal Government to control navigation.

The States, or rather the original Colonies, when they separated from England were all sovereign States. They surrendered to the Federal Government only the right to control navigation in the navigable streams and waters under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The rest of the rights in these streams and waters, the water-power rights and the right of fishing, they reserved to themselves.

But I realize that that question has been thrashed out, so far as this House is concerned, and is an academic question, and I am willing to waive that question in order to get legislation to release these vast water powers—60,000,000 horsepower, that the experts tell us may be developed without storing, and 200,000,000 may be developed with storage, each horsepower equal to the annual consumption of 10 tons of coal or 30 barrels of oil. I want to see this horsepower developed, and for that reason I am willing, reluctantly, I may say, to acquiesce in this legislation.

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] has given us a valuable treatise upon the legal definitions and the interpretations of the courts concerning navigable streams and what are navigable streams. I compliment him upon his very careful gleaning over of the decisions and the massing them together here to-day. But the decisions which he read were decisions in cases where the courts were determining the vested rights, the rights of individuals along streams, navigable and nonnavigable streams. They have no relation or no bearing upon this bill. The courts determined whether the stream in question was a navigable or a nonnavigable stream in order to ascertain in those cases the rights of the riparian owner, for a riparian owner on a nonnavigable stream has the right of access to the stream, the right to cross the stream, the right to use the stream without molestation, and that right can not be taken away from him without his being compensated for the loss of that right. But the right of the riparian owner upon a navigable stream is an entirely different matter. The access of the riparian owner on the navigable stream can be taken away from him by the Government under the exercise of the Government's right to control navigation, and his wharfage rights may be taken from him. He only owns a qualified fee in the bed of a navigable stream, whereas on a nonnavigable stream he owns the absolute right to the bed of the stream.

Now, this definition in the bill in no way changes that rule of law, and as the gentleman from Maine well said, Congress can not change that rule of law. We can not declare that under certain conditions a stream is a navigable stream and deprive the riparian owner of his rights; and we do not undertake to do that, but merely to say that "for the purposes of this act a stream in a certain condition is a navigable stream," and that is all that we are undertaking to do. Under this bill we respect the rights of the States. In fact, no license can be granted under this bill unless the applicant shows that he has complied with the laws of the individual States.

Let me read to you some of the provisions recognizing the rights of the States. On page 19, subsection (b), it is provided that each applicant must show:

Satisfactory evidence that the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State or States within which the proposed project is to be located with respect to bed and banks and to the appropriation, diversion, and use of water for power purposes and with respect to the right to engage in the business of developing, transmitting, and distributing power, and in any other business necessary to effect the purposes of a license under this act.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman? I do not wish to interrupt him needlessly.

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to ask the gentleman a question about that particular subsection that he was referring to. It says each applicant for a license shall submit to the commission (b) satisfactory evidence that the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State or States. In the gentleman's interpretation does that carry any contractual agreement to observe the requirements of the law as to the licenses granted?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think it does, especially when you read it in connection with section 27.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That troubles me, because it says "has complied," and I supposed that meant only up to the time of making the application. I was interested to get the gentleman's opinion that there is carried in that the suggestion that the licensee must conform to the State laws after the license is granted.

Mr. SINNOTT. Both the present and the future requirements. Section 27 provides—

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses, or any vested right acquired therein.

The State may provide that before one can secure the right to appropriate the water the electricity developed from the water must be used in a certain way. All through this bill the right of the State is recognized. The right of the State is recognized to fix the charges, to control the securities, and if the State has no public-utilities commission and no law covering that point, then the commission itself fixes that.

The bill also provides for efficient power production, and that at the end of the 50-year period the property may be taken over by paying the net investment. Now, that net investment does not mean what we commonly refer to as the net investment. It means the legitimate investment, the legitimate expense put into the property, less certain deductions. If at the end of the 50-year period it is found that the licensee has made excessive profits, why then those excessive profits are deducted from the net investment, and to that extent the net investment is reduced. Also to the extent that they are accumulated from earnings in excess of a fair return there is also deducted from the net investment the following:

First. Unappropriated surplus.

Second. Aggregate credit balances of current depreciation accounts.

Third. Aggregate appropriations of surplus or income held in amortization, sinking fund, or similar reserves, or expended for additions or betterments or used for the purposes for which such reserves were created.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the conference committee with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SIMS moves to recommit the conference report to the conference committee with instructions to further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendments numbered 8 and 36 and to agree to Senate amendment numbered 44.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SIMS. I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair thinks there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. As many as favor the motion to recommit will, as their names are called, vote yea, those opposed nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 209, answered "present" 1, not voting 130, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 13870, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, there has been much discussion on the floor of this House and throughout the country in regard to an increase of pay in the Navy, Army, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and Public Health Service. The conference committee is at present endeavoring to reconcile the bills passed by the House and the Senate in reference to this very important matter. I fully realize the need of economy, of strict economy, in Federal expenditures, and by my vote I have repeatedly expressed my determination to curtail national extravagance, but when reduction creates inefficiency and curtailment causes deterioration, then it is not economy but waste.

I feel that in order to keep our military service up to the standard of efficiency we expect and demand, an increase in pay, both of officers and men, is not merely desirable but imperatively necessary, not kindness but justice.

Personally I prefer a force smaller in numbers and greater in efficiency than one greater in numbers and smaller in effectiveness. If the pay account is to remain as it is, it were better, in my opinion, that the amount be spread over a smaller number of officers and men, which would operate as an increase, thus stimulating enlistments and strengthening the morale of the entire service. With the higher rates of compensation being offered and paid by commercial enterprise, our officers and men are rapidly leaving the service, and discontent on the part of those who remain is the natural and inevitable consequence. Our standards of excellence can not be maintained unless we recognize and meet conditions. We are confronted not by theories but by facts, and while officers and men are imbued with patriotism and love of service the pressure of increased expenses becomes not only a hardship but an obstacle too great for them to surmount on their present rates of pay.

Let me analyze each branch of our military service.

THE ARMY.

While West Point is looked upon as the source of supply for our Army officers, less than half of our Regulars come from this institution. Since the establishment of the Military Academy 118 years ago there have been less than 5,000 graduates, and it is safe to say that of the officers in the Regular Army to-day not 1,000 are graduates of West Point.

At no time since the academy was established have there been so many vacancies, 770 I understand, due, without question, in large part to the unattractiveness of Army life from the financial standpoint. It is but fair to state that these vacancies may also be attributable in a small degree to the desire of our people to return to a peace basis.

Since the signing of the armistice 2,452 officers have resigned from the Regular Army, due primarily to the fact that these officers could not maintain their families on Army pay, and, secondly, because of the larger inducements offered in civilian life.

Reference has been made in this House to the fact that these officers do not need an increase of pay since they received promotion during the war. But it is a fact, according to statistics obtained from the War Department, that while there were in promotions 72 per cent during the war of all officers in the Regular Army, since the armistice was signed they have all been demoted except 25 per cent, and these officers will be demoted by the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1920.

In regard to enlisted men and noncommissioned officers, the desertions from the Regular Army between March 1, 1919, and April 1, 1920, reached the astounding number of 11,000, the reason being insufficiency of pay and the lack of inducement to remain in the service. This state of affairs is cause for reflection, and should prompt us to action if we are to have an Army worthy of the traditions and the achievements of its splendid past.

THE NAVY.

Not all Regular Navy officers are graduates of the Naval Academy, although the great majority of those of the line of the Regular Navy come from Annapolis. Since the establishment of the Naval Academy 75 years ago there have been 5,693 graduates, and to-day there are about 2,825 in the Regular Navy, as compared with the 6,326 officers who never attended the academy. The graduates of the Naval Academy serve in the line, in the Construction Corps, and, in a very few cases, in the Civil Engineering Corps. The number of vacancies in the Naval Academy is greater than it has been in many years, amounting to 247 for which no nominations have been made.

Of all officers in the Regular Navy, line and staff combined, there have been 2,130 resignations since the armistice, of whom approximately 1,450 were line officers. Of Regular officers who were in the service prior to the war, something over 400 have resigned, line and staff combined.

Reference has repeatedly been made to war promotions. War promotions as applied to the Navy is a misnomer. Congress authorized a permanent number of officers in the United States Navy. During the war the Navy being short of this permanent number, Congress authorized the filling up of these permanent places temporarily. This is the so-called "war promotions" of the Navy. Among officers of over eight years' service, very few, as a result of this so-called emergency promotion, received an increase of 18 per cent. A comparatively large number received an increase of 15 per cent, and many received an increase of only 11 per cent. Several officers of long service received no increase whatever. Remarks in regard to emergency promotions in the Navy, it is believed, are not applicable.

As to enlisted men, during the last six months of 1919 there were 4,666 desertions from the Regular Navy, of whom 1,057 were petty officers and 60 chief petty officers. The total for February was 765 desertions, of whom 60 were petty officers and 7 were chief petty officers. Prior to the war the desertion of a petty officer was unusual, and the desertion of a chief petty officer almost unheard of. The petty officers and chief petty officers are now our old-time men. They have not deserted because their training has not been good or because they do not realize the seriousness of the offense, but for the simple reason that they are driven to desert in order to care for their families.

In this connection we must not lose sight of the fact that the merchant marine service is offering inducements for seamen far greater than the law permits the Navy to offer them. These men are human, and while desertion must be condemned in the sternest terms, we should not forget that the emoluments of civilian life beckon them to other pursuits.

Such is the condition to-day in the Navy of the United States, a situation that must be remedied and remedied at once if the Navy, in theory and in practice, is to continue as the first line of defense of the Nation and remain true to its mighty history—a history which is the pride and the glory of every American.

THE MARINE CORPS.

Since December, 1918, a total of 114 permanent and probationary officers have resigned from the Marine Corps. They are subdivided according to their grades as follows:

Lieutenant colonels	1
Majors	2
Captains	85
First lieutenants	22
Second lieutenants	4
Permanent	54
Probationary	60
Total	114

Since December, 1918, a total of 889 temporary officers have resigned from the Marine Corps. They are subdivided according to their grades as follows:

Captains	179
First lieutenants	397
Second lieutenants	313
Total	889

The desertions of enlisted men are as follows:

1919.
March	44
April	41
May	45
June	21
July	43
August	91
September	52
October	59
November	88
December	70
1920.
January	73
February	82
March	81
Total	893

Here is a service whose valiant deeds in every war is a record of glory and of brilliant accomplishment. Yet to-day their ranks are depleted because we have failed to recognize the exigencies of the hour.

The necessity for advancing pay to meet advancing costs of living has been recognized and accepted by practically all the great nations in every branch of the service, with the exception of the United States.

In the British Navy the increase of pay for officers over prewar rates reaches as high as 185 per cent, and these increases apply to officers of the Royal Marines. The pay of the enlisted men of both services has been doubled.

In the French Navy the increase of officers' pay reaches from 35 per cent to 129 per cent, while the pay of the men has been advanced in proportion.

In the Italian Navy the increase of officers' pay has been made at the flat rate of 30 per cent, and the pay of the men has been advanced in proportion.

In the Japanese Navy the increase of officers' pay extends from 30 per cent to 50 per cent, with additional compensation to enlisted men.

In the Chinese Navy a flat increase of 20 per cent in the pay of officers has been made, with increases in the pay of sailors.

While I have no figures showing the pay advances in other branches of the service of other nations, I understand the increases have been material.

THE COAST GUARD.

The situation in the Coast Guard as regards personnel is most serious, and is causing the administrative officers very great concern. The service is in serious straits on account of the lack of a sufficient number of men to man its vessels and stations, and because such few men as are obtainable are untrained and much below the standards necessary for the proper performance of the important and hazardous work of the Coast Guard. Men are leaving the service as their terms of enlistment expire, and many whose terms have not expired are clamoring for discharge. It has become practically impossible to secure adequate replacements. The sole reason for this most serious condition lies in the fact that the rates of pay allowed by law in the Coast Guard are too low to meet existing conditions, and are extremely low in comparison with the pay that the same type of men can receive in the merchant marine or in practically any other civil pursuit.

So serious has the situation become that the Coast Guard has actually been compelled to place a number of its cruising cutters out of commission because there are not sufficient men to man them. Only recently it was found necessary to place five of the cruising vessels on the eastern coast out of commission in order to attempt to provide adequate crews for vessels participating in the patrol of the Bering Sea and North Pacific Ocean to enforce the provisions of the convention of July 1, 1911, between the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and Japan for the protection of the fur seal and sea otter and the performance of other important duties in Alaska.

The withdrawal of these vessels from active service on the eastern seaboard is a very serious matter. Commerce upon the Atlantic has greatly increased since the active operations of war have ceased, and it will continue to increase rapidly, carrying with it corresponding liability to accident and casualty. There can be no better evidence of the imperative need of full and adequate equipment and personnel for the Coast Guard than the work that service is now doing. During the past nine months the Coast Guard has rendered assistance to vessels and cargoes whose value amounted to the enormous sum of $55,000,000. There were on board these vessels between 6,000 and 7,000 persons, and more than 2,000 persons have been rescued from positions of actual peril through the instrumentality of the Coast Guard. These most impressive figures do not include the various items of miscellaneous assistance that the crews of vessels and stations of the Coast Guard are constantly rendering.

A similar condition of affairs exists at many of the shore stations, and it is very probable, if something is not done shortly to improve the situation, that a number of stations will have to be placed out of commission and their crews concentrated at points where they can work to the greatest advantage. The Coast Guard stations on the Great Lakes opened for active service on March 1 with greatly reduced complements, some stations actually having no more than three or four regular men—not enough to man a boat.

The number of enlisted men required properly to man the units of the Coast Guard is 5,745, and there are to-day only 3,709 enlisted men in the service, a shortage of 2,036 existing. The number of desertions in this small corps since the armistice amounts to 442, an unprecedented number in the Coast Guard. Since November, 1918, there have been 1,115 court-martial cases, including deck courts, minor courts, and so forth. The depleted state of the enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard would be even worse than it is but for the fact that many of the older men are holding on in the hope that legislation to remedy conditions will be enacted in the near future.

Twenty-two warrant officers have tendered their resignations since the armistice. The warrant officers are the very backbone of the service. Unless pending legislation be enacted, they will, after the proclamation of peace, revert to a base pay, in most grades, of $75 per month. They can not possibly live on this sum and they will be compelled to leave the Coast Guard. If the warrant officers leave the service in any considerable numbers, as they will be compelled to do, the Coast Guard can not operate.

In regard to commissioned officers, the number authorized by law in the Coast Guard is 270. There are to-day only 212 officers. Twenty-two officers have resigned since the signing of the armistice. Much has been said to the effect that commissioned officers are not entitled to an increase in pay because they have been very materially advanced in rank during the war and because under sundry plans of reorganization of the military services they might hold advanced rank or even be advanced still further. I desire to make this matter clear as regards commissioned officers of the Coast Guard.

Under war-time legislation, of the officers of the Coast Guard holding regular rank corresponding to commander in the Navy just three have been advanced to the next higher rank. Of officers holding the normal rank of lieutenant commander, just 13 out of a total number of 37 have been advanced to the grade of commander. There are officers in the Coast Guard of the rank of lieutenant commander who have had over 25 years' continuous service, some of whom commanded combatant ships of the Coast Guard and of the Navy in the war zone, and who have received no temporary advance whatever. Certain war-time legislation has, indeed, permitted the temporary advancement of the younger officers to the same temporary grade as that attained by officers of the Navy of corresponding length of service, not above the rank of lieutenant commander. All temporary advanced rank in the Coast Guard ceases absolutely not later than six months after peace shall have been proclaimed.

The Coast Guard needs about 70 cadets for training at the Coast Guard Academy at New London to become commissioned officers. An examination has just been held, after being given wide publicity throughout the country. From this examination it is found that not more than six cadets are obtainable. Conditions in the Coast Guard as regards enlisted personnel are fully as bad as those confronting any of the other military services.

It is of decided interest to note that the percentage of total personnel who lost their lives in the World War as a direct result of enemy action is larger in the case of the Coast Guard than in the case of the Army. This speaks for itself. It is not necessary for me to describe the work of the Coast Guard in time of peace. It is a hazardous calling at all times, demanding courage, determination, and ceaseless vigilance by day and by night—a calling in which only the hardy and fearless can endure. Its difficult, dangerous, and extremely valuable services are well understood and gratefully appreciated by everyone interested in the lives and fortunes of those "who go down to the sea in ships and have their business on great waters."

THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

In October, 1918, there were in the regular corps of the Public Health Service 217 commissioned officers. Since that time there have been 4 admissions to the corps, 3 deaths, and 21 resignations. Prior to that date the Public Health Service usually obtained by admission 10 to 15 officers per year and lost practically none by resignation.

The reserve of the Public Health Service was established in October, 1918. In order to obtain medical officers for the medical care and treatment of war-risk insurance patients the service commissioned 472 reserve officers who were leaving either the Army or Navy. Of the number recruited in this way 76 have resigned. It is almost impossible to secure new recruits. The importance of this service, especially to those who wore the uniform in the recent war, should appeal to us to enact legislation for relief.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I received a letter this morning from a constituent who very pointedly requested me to inform him why his community was compelled to pay six times as much for a pound of sugar as it did 10 years ago. An inquiry like fixing a specific date naturally would carry a man's mind back to the political situation in 1910. I remember that this high cost of living is not at all a new term in political discussion. I remember very well in my own county and district that every little Democratic convention declared it to be its specific purpose to reduce the high cost of living. That campaign began in 1908. It had gained full headway in 1910, and from the results that have been obtained, the Lord only knows how much we shall be able to reduce the high cost of living in the next decade.

In another letter there was a request to know about the condition of the President of the United States—his physical condition—and the suggestion that there is a profound apprehension on the part of the people that the President of the United States is not able to fully function, and that that apprehension does not come out of any want of sympathy for the very unfortunate condition in which the Chief Executive finds himself. Of course, no Member of Congress knows, and there is no way in which any Member of Congress can find out, whether there is now disability under the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Why does not the gentleman introduce a resolution to investigate the subject? You are investigating everything else.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Would the gentleman vote for a resolution of that kind?

Mr. McKEOWN. I would not.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. It is a strange and unprecedented situation in which we find ourselves. The gentleman from Oklahoma asked me if I would introduce a resolution of that kind. Not at all. It would be ineffective, and, in my judgment, both unwise and unkind. However, it is certainly pertinent on the floor of this House to voice what is in the mind and heart of the people in respect to whether there is a possibility under the Constitution to enact a law that would make it possible when there is such a question in respect to disability for the people to know, and I doubt not that out of the present very tragic circumstances, if actuated only by a feeling of sympathy, there will come ultimately a solution of this problem.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. For the information of the gentleman I would state that I have just received an afternoon edition of a paper in which it is stated that the President is recovering rapidly, that he is getting all right, that he is able to attend to his business, and is now taking rides and strolling around without the aid of any physician, that he is able to look after his duties. This paper is a Republican paper, and I take it that what it states is true.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The credulity of the gentleman is remarkable under all the circumstances. I wish to God it were true. I can think of no more unfortunate circumstance that has come to this country than the breaking down of President Wilson, and I wish that he were strong and rugged and able to stand forth in the fight that he is making, as he has stood hitherto. [Applause.]

But I am not willing that that unfortunate circumstance shall be presumptive evidence of the fact that his course is wise and for the best interest of the country. Unfortunately, perhaps his very condition makes it less likely that there will be such careful, full, and drastic analyses of many of the things which he has proposed as would otherwise be true. There has been much discussion in the general debate here on a variety of topics relating either directly or indirectly to the politics of the present year. Do you know as a man sits and listens first to one side and then to the other, if he wants to think honestly, if he wants to conclude in harmony with his thought, if he wants, above all else, to do his duty as a representative of the people, that he often wishes the statements made on both sides as to matters of fact, at least, could be taken without any color as to their absolute truth. But unfortunately most speeches are tempered by the particular effect that they may have upon political fortunes.

Mr. RAKER. Will my distinguished friend from Indiana yield for a question right there?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. On the first question that was propounded by this constituent the gentleman did not answer. Would the gentleman tell us what his answer was for the reason of the rise in price on sugar six times to what it was five years ago?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. He undertook to make no answer.

Mr. RAKER. But what is the gentleman's answer?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. He asked me how I would explain to my constituents the fact of that raise and whether I could introduce a law that would reduce it. I have not answered that letter yet. [Laughter.] My own conviction is that in the main the price of sugar has been determined and has risen due to the law of supply and demand until in the very recent months, when my judgment is, although I do not know—I wish I did—that there has been concerted buying and reselling and reselling again and again.

Mr. RAKER. For the purpose of raising it?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. For the purpose of raising it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. When the gentleman writes the letter will he kindly put a copy of that letter in the RECORD? Some of us are getting the same requests and we would like to send such a statement to our constituents.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I would be very glad to collaborate with the gentleman in framing such a letter [laughter] that would properly and satisfactorily answer the gentleman. You see, your constituents sometimes, perhaps unwisely, think you have access to sources of knowledge which are denied you. Then I began to wonder why that selling and reselling and mounting, and so on, has been permitted under the law. I remember under the food-control act, when the Lever Act was before us, I thought, and I think Mr. Lever thought, and that the committee which framed the bill thought and the men who voted for the bill thought, that that act gave full power to this country absolutely to control the price of the necessaries of life. If it did not, and it seems from the inaction of the Attorney General that has been his interpretation of it, then the act is a failure. When President Wilson returned from France and came before this Congress, he asked for additional legislation, and on the 22d of August there was an amendment to the Lever Food Act, brought in by the Committee on Agriculture, which expressly provided it to be a criminal offense in any way to increase or to charge excessive prices for the necessities of life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Just a minute more.

Mr. GOOD. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. That law passed the House, passed the Senate, was agreed to on the 11th day of October, and now we are told that the pyramiding of the price of sugar can not be controlled by the Attorney General. I have little faith in legislation controlling the high cost of living, and certainly when that high cost of living primarily grows out of the law of supply and demand; but shall we say to the people of this country, with a Democratic Congress in power since 1910, for nine years, until the 4th of March, 1919, that they are unable to draft any law that an Attorney General appointed by a Democratic President could enforce against the high cost of living?

Mr. GARNER, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas rose.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I have only two or three minutes, and I want to finish, if you please, and I refuse to yield. And then when the Lever food act was passed and the additional act passed, shall we say to all now that with this power we are helpless? I am not a lawyer, men, but it does seem strange to me that after your 10 years of that slogan, "Reduce the high cost of living," and 6 years under absolute control of all the departments of the Government, that the party that started that slogan informs us that in this year of grace 1920 we find ourselves absolutely helpless. It may be so; it may be so; but, oh, what a commentary on the inefficiency or the impossibility of enacting a law to control those matters!

No law can be enacted that will control the high cost of living in so far as it is due to increased cost of production or determined by the law of supply and demand. Every power that Congress can grant by way of law for the control of profiteering is now upon the statute books. The outrageous profiteering in sugar grew out of the failure of the President to permit the Sugar Equalization Board to buy the Cuban crop at 6¾ cents. I am reliably informed that in August of last year this board requested the permission of the President to purchase the crop of 1919 from Cuba. This request was renewed in November of the same year. The President acknowledged the receipt of the letters, but did not delegate to the sugar board the authority to make purchase. There was but one man on the board who opposed the purchase of this crop. For the failure to secure that crop the American people are paying to the profiteers a sum variously estimated at from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. Even that failure does not warrant the excessive prices that are now being exacted. In 1918 the Louisiana sugar producers received 9 cents per pound for their sugar. In 1919 they had half a crop, and the Attorney General of the United States permitted them to charge 18 cents per pound. The price permitted by the Department of Justice began the phenomenal rise in the price of sugar.

Thus the Government undertook to compensate the sugar dealers of Louisiana for their crop failure by permitting them to fix the price at 18 cents when at the same time the Government knew perfectly well that Louisiana produces but a tithe of the sugar used in this country. On the same reasoning, if any State had raised but half its usual crop of wheat the Government might have justified itself in permitting the farmer to charge $4 per bushel for wheat and thus have raised that necessary of life by 100 per cent. The Government has no excuse for the bungling manner in which this sugar situation has been handled. The American people are paying the bill. Even now, if the Department of Justice would act as it is empowered by law to act, the upward movement of sugar could be arrested. The unfortunate long-continued absence of the Chief Executive in Europe, coupled with his unfortunate and most lamentable sickness, has deprived the American people of the service of their Chief Executive in full power and strength for 14 months of the time since December of 1918. In other words, for 14 months out of 17 the Chief Executive of the Nation has been unable because of absence or illness to properly attend to the domestic affairs of a Nation of 110,000,000 people.

Even his chief advisors have been denied the privilege of counseling together concerning the most vital interests of the Nation. This situation is tragic, indeed. Only the wise, tolerant, patient, and forbearing spirit of the American people has made it possible for order and peace to prevail. We shall weather every storm, for in the heart of every true American there is abundant faith in our institutions, hallowed by the suffering and sacrifice of those who have gone before. There is abundant hope in the present and the future because of the richness and fullness of our physical heritage. There is undying love for the beneficent institutions under which we live. There is joy and pride in the consciousness of our strength and the rectitude of our intentions. "With malice toward none and with charity toward all" we shall continue to cleave to those principles of government that have made the Republic the refuge of the oppressed and the hope of every country struggling toward liberty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the House for the privilege of submitting these remarks on this legislation at this time, because of the far-reaching effects it may have upon the social, agricultural, and industrial system of Continental United States.

In so far as this bill (H. R. 13500) provides for the relief of the Hawaiian race, I am heartily in favor of it, and I believe that it will meet with the general approval of Congress. Our people have usually been in accord upon legislation dealing with dependent races and, with the exception of the slavery issue, party politics have rarely marked the cleavage line in the intercourse of the American white man with other peoples. A benevolent policy has been particularly true of our attitude toward the American Indians and the Hawaiians.

In both cases, those races have been upon our frontiers—either military or naval, and the Federal legislation that has been enacted here usually had its inception in military considerations when we felt it necessary to more firmly establish American authority among them.

But, Mr. Chairman, it will be an evil day whenever we confuse military considerations with our civil policy in dealing with the Hawaiian Islands. In saying this I do not intend the slightest reflection upon the patriotism or the good citizenship of either the native population or the small group of American citizens who have cast their lot among them and who constitute an overwhelming percentage of the professional and commercial classes. My remarks are not uttered in an unkind spirit, but the presence of those Americans must not blind us to the fact that the island population is overwhelmingly Asiatic and that Hawaiian institutions are as un-American as the people who make up the bulk of the population.

In saying this, Mr. Chairman, I am only echoing what has been said in the past by the leaders of both of the great political parties. When the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty was under consideration April 6, 1876, Gen. Garfield, who shortly thereafter was called to the Presidency, said in addressing this House in support of that treaty:

I do not approve of the Hawaiian treaty, because it looks in the direction of securing possession of those islands. * * * We occupy a portion of that great northern zone which girdles the world and which has been the theater of the greatest achievements of civilization, especially in the history of the Anglo-Saxon races; but should we extend our possessions into the tropical belt, we should weaken the powers of our people and Government. Hence I disclaim any purpose or suggestion of annexation of those islands as any part of my reason for supporting the treaty. On the contrary, one of the reasons why I favor the treaty is that it will be a satisfactory substitute for all probable schemes of annexation that may come if this fails. * * * This treaty will completely avoid such a result as that.

That debate shows that as many Democrats as Republicans favored the treaty, because they thought it would forever dispose of the question of bringing these islands, with their un-American institutions, into our political system; but Gen. Randall Lee Gibson, of Louisiana, who followed Gen. Garfield, was opposed to both annexation and the reciprocity treaty. He favored the maintenance of the treaty relations then existing, and in view of subsequent developments his warning to the American people was prophetic. After exposing the insincerity and the guile of the group of speculators who were exploiting the natives of Hawaii upon the one hand and the American people on the other, he asked:

What is the convention that is proposed to us to-day? It is, in effect, that sugar, which is the chief article of production and every pound of which for exportation, it has already been seen, comes to this country, shall be admitted free of duty. It has been estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that the amount so remitted for the fiscal year 1873 is about $320,345. But with increased production the subsidy, and consequent loss of revenue, will equal the sum of one, two, and probably three millions. This amount bestowed as a bonus on the 25 or 30 American sugar planters would necessarily enhance their profits and stimulate production. It would be an invitation to those planters to bring hordes of Chinese into the Hawaiian Islands under the contract system which prevails there, and they would extend the area of sugar culture so as to embrace every foot of arable soil.

I ask, gentlemen, if it is desirable, looking at the true welfare of the people of the Sandwich Islands, that we should be a party to a policy that shall convert the islands into one vast and crowded Chinese settlement devoted to the exclusive task of producing sugar.

* * * * * * *

Sir, open these islands to these eastern hordes and you condemn their whole civilization, their institutions, their liberties founded upon law, the benevolent auspices under which these people are being gradually trained and growing up into a well-formed and compact commonwealth; you condemn them to a state worse than that from which you have but recently rescued them, to a moral and intellectual sterility in striking contrast to the gardens these Chinese materialists, debased and debasing, will plant upon all their slopes and planes, their hillsides and valleys.

* * * * * * *

Gentlemen have delighted us with the spectacle of a proud dependency far out in the Pacific Sea, a half-way house for our caravans laden with the rich treasures of the East; our flag flying over Honolulu; our garrisons passing in reviews before some general officer in command of the islands; our heaviest guns crowning their ramparts, and our invincible monitors quietly sleeping in the harbors of Pearl River, but ready at the first tocsin of war with Great Britain to wake the echoes of those silent seas with their loudest thunders and to drive the British fleet from the track of our commerce.

But gentlemen are mistaken. All this fine record, these bright visions, these dreams of extended empire, vanish at the touch of fact. Sober-minded men, charged with the responsibilities of government, will appeal from these fancy sketches to the prosaic terms of the convention itself. And when they shall analyze them, they will at once perceive that there are no flagstaffs, no ramparts, not even Pearl River harbors that were to have been offered to us according to Mr. Nordhoof, no emblems of empire, but only sugar, provided we will admit it free of duty. A serious proposition to buy trade; a matter of mere dollars and cents; a vulgar subsidy in favor of a few men and no reciprocity. Where, then, is your lofty statesmanship?

Mr. Chairman, note how that prophecy has been fulfilled. It is true that a Japanese menace has been substituted for the Chinese, but the menace has nevertheless been successfully introduced into our political system by these Hawaiian interests. The 25 or 30 American sugar planters who were flourishing out there when the reciprocity treaty was passed, have incorporated their properties and are now conducting their operations in brazen defiance of the Federal statutes.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert in the RECORD an extract from the testimony of Gov. McCarthy of Hawaii, when he was testifying before the Committee on the Territories on February 3, 1920. Chairman Curry asked the governor if under the law a corporation was not limited to holding 1,000 acres of land.

The governor replied in the affirmative, on page 15 of the committee hearings. The record of the hearings before the committee continues, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, there are plantations of 10,000, 15,000, and 20,000 acres that are organized along these lines, if I am correctly informed. There may be 5, 10, 15, or 20 men organize a corporation. They have a thousand acres of land as one corporation of which John Doe is chairman. There are 5, 10, 15, or 20 men interested in each one of these corporations. Now, there is another corporation of which Richard Roe is chairman and so on down the line, 5, 10, 15, or 20 men, so that the same men are interested in the 5, 10, 15, or 20 lots of land of a thousand acres each, and while one corporation is only supposed to own and work a thousand acres of land, that corporation by this roundabout method of interlocking control and ownership owns 20,000 acres, 10,000 acres, or 5,000 acres. It looks to me as though that system was in violation of law, and that it has a tendency to create large sugar holdings and to discourage and make unprofitable the holdings of 10 or 15, or 20 or 40 acres of land as sugar plantations, for this reason. Sugar cane is only valuable where you can get it to the mill. These large plantations each have a mill. Men with 40 acres can not afford to put up a mill. The large plantations can pay him so little for his sugar cane that it does not make it profitable for him to raise sugar. Does not that condition exist in the islands or have you tried to stop it?

Gov. MCCARTHY. They have got over this section of the law. There is no doubt about it. They form land companies that will take up a thousand acres—buy a thousand acres—and then each land company, each of these individual land companies, makes either leases of plantations, or in one case several of these small corporations have formed a copartnership or corporation. Whether that thing is according to law or not I do not know, but it has been done. I understand that the present United States district attorney is going to take the matter into court to find out if that is a transgression of the United States law. Attorney General Irwin cabled to his office the other day to find out if the case had been entered as yet, and he had an answer that it had not.

Mr. Irwin, the present attorney general of the Territory, who was present, interposed at this juncture to enlighten the committee with the following bit of interesting information:

Mr. IRWIN. I would like to say, Mr. Curry, that in my conversation with you I told you that Mr. Huber, the United States attorney, had told me he had filed a case. After leaving you I began to reflect on that, and I sent a cable there to find out about it. I was incorrect. I have gone over this matter with him several times. I know that he is working on it and that he is about ready to file a case. Neither he nor I are entirely sure of what the results will be.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those land companies acting under any advice of Federal officials?

Mr. IRWIN. I am informed that before they proceeded along those lines they asked the opinion of the then United States District Attorney Breckons, and he advised them that they could proceed along those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. If they have his advice, what do you expect to do with them?

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Rawlins was Mr. Breckons's assistant at that time and may be able to give you more information.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. Breckons never passed on that matter at all.

Mr. IRWIN. That is the impression in Hololulu. Whether it is true or not I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. If they are acting on the authority of a United States district attorney, even though the advice may be illegal, it is going to be pretty hard work for you to convict them of an illegal act.

Mr. IRWIN. The organic act is very specific. It provides that in case of violations of that provision of the law the land is to escheat to the United States of America. Whether they are acting under legal advice or not, if it is a violation of the law, that would be no defense.

In the brief time that I have it is impossible for me to quote in extenso from the hearings before the Committee on Territories, but the one hundred and ninety-odd pages are replete with matter of the most interesting, not to say the most startling, character.

In the running colloquy from which I have just quoted between the chairman of the committee and the governor and attorney general of the Territory evidence was adduced that the agricultural corporations on those islands were not only defying the land laws of the United States in the most open fashion but it was asserted that this was being done by the consent of the United States district attorney of the Hawaiian Islands.

I do not believe all stories of graft, of malfeasance in public office that has shocked the American people since the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty was up here for consideration nearly 40 years ago, but these committee hearings disclose a condition that undoubtedly calls for your most serious consideration. I have only time to quote a few extracts, but they will give the House an idea of the shameless manner in which the native Hawaiian has been exploited.

Senator Wise, one of the native leaders, and a members of the Territorial General Assembly, in describing to the committee the lands that he asks Congress to restore to his people, testified (p. 142):

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN H. WISE.

Mr. WISE. The first piece of land is Kamaoa-Puueo, on the island of Hawaii, in the district of Kau, 11,140 acres, leased to the Waiohinu Agricultural and Grazing Co. The lease is for 21 years and expires May 21, 1929. It contains a withdrawal clause.

Gov. MCCARTHY. What is the annual rental?

Mr. WISE. $200.

Mr. MONAHAN. How many head of stock can you carry on that, Senator?

Mr. WISE. I do not know how many head of stock you could run independent of other lands.

The CHAIRMAN. How much have they in that ranch?

Mr. WISE. This ranch, I should say, is running something like 5,000 to 6,000 head, and they have all these lands here. [Indicating.] They have leased other pieces, several other pieces, and own some lands in fee.

The CHAIRMAN. Amounting to how much?

Mr. WISE. There is another piece leased to them of 2,060 acres for 21 years. The lease is for $55. There is another piece of Waiohinu, 15,000 acres, leased to the Hutchinson sugar plantation. The ranch lands are under the sugar plantation. That lease expired in 1914. Portions of that are in ranch and portions in sugar cane. They have a piece in Kona, I think; I am not certain, however.

Gov. MCCARTHY. What is the annual rental?

Mr. WISE. Annual rental is $600 for Waiohinu.

Within the Hutchinson sugar plantation they have another 11,000 acres. The rental is $75 a year.

He testified of many such leases, among them Pauahi, 750 acres at an annual rental of $3.52 to the Parker Ranch.

Gov. McCarthy summarizes the matter in a general way at page 34 of the hearings. He says, speaking of the Crown lands, approximately 1,600,000 acres:

The income from those Crown lands in 1890 was $50,000 a year, and many of the leases were made at a time when the lands were fit only for pasture and had very little value; but after 1876, when the reciprocity treaty went into effect, these pasture lands were then converted into sugar lands, so that the lands had a greatly increased intrinsic value. As an instance, the Crown lands on Kauai, 57,000 acres, were leased to one man at $4,000 a year. The lease expires on the 1st of June this year. The lease was extended a year to enable them to take off the crop, and last year $100,000 income was received from portions of the lands which they sublet, and they had a cattle ranch outside of that.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SHINGLE. I would like to amplify the governor's statement with reference to this piece of land the lease of which expires this year. I would like to put into the record that for this land there has been an upset price of $5,000,000, or a rental price of $250,000 a year. That is an upset rental that would be offered for this land.

Mr. DOWELL. Who gets this, the Government?

Mr. RAWLINS. The Government gets $4,000 and the lessor $100,000.

Mr. DOWELL. This is by lease which the Government made?

Mr. RAWLINS. And which has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. If the Government leases it, it will get what rental?

Gov. MCCARTHY. $250,000 a year.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will not dwell further upon this phase of the subject, because I think that these disclosures have received the careful consideration of the committee, which will recommend a suitable means of dealing with these lands for the best interest of the Hawaiian people.

There is, however, a feature of this matter which concerns every household in the United States, which threatens the standards of American living and American institutions, and I feel it my duty to see that it does not pass unnoticed. The prophecy which the Hon. Randall Lee Gibson, of Louisiana, made upon this floor nearly half a century ago, that the plantation interests would turn these islands into an oriental colony, has been fulfilled. Note what the governor of the Territory has to say upon this subject at page 17 of the hearings:

Gov. MCCARTHY. The last official census was 1910. At that time the total population was 191,909, of which 29,099 were Hawaiians; part Hawaiians, 12,485; Portuguese, 22,294; Chinese, 21,698; Japanese, 79,663; Spanish, 1,962; Porto Ricans, 4,828; other Caucasians, 14,684; Filipinos, 8,196. The estimated population for the period ending June 30, 1919, was 263,666.

He also submitted a census table compiled last year showing how the population for 1919 was divided. It was as follows:

Hawaiians	22,600
Part Hawaiians	16,600
Portuguese	25,000
Chinese	22,800
Japanese	110,000
Spanish	2,400
Porto Ricans	5,400
Filipinos	22,000
All others	5,806
American, British, German, and Russian	31,000
Total	263,666

In this connection I think it well to reproduce an extract from a distinguished Federal judge, which the chairman had incorporated in the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. In the Constitutional Review for January of this year, Judge William W. Morrow, judge of the United States circuit court of appeals for the district of which Hawaii is a part, has an article on "The Americanism of the Constitution of the United States," and in that article appears the following:

"When I was in Honolulu three years ago," which would be 1917, "it was represented that in 10 years the majority of the voting population of that Territory would be children of Japanese born in the Hawaiian Islands since they became a part of the territory of the United States in the year 1900, and that this voting population would naturally tend to the building up of Japanese political ideals in the Territory unless it is Americanized. I explained to those who brought the matter to my attention that the only remedy, it seemed to me, was to see to it that these Japanese children were thoroughly trained in our form of government and its political institutions; that they ought to be taught the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States and be made so familiar with them that they could declare, as aliens are now required to prove in order to become citizens, that they are attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.

"In this connection, I noticed in the public press a few days ago the following in the dispatches from Honolulu: 'Within 14 years Hawaiian-born Japanese will hold the political control in this Territory, according to the Rev. Umataro Okumura, a prominent Japanese clergyman, speaking at a church convention here. To prepare for the inevitable, declared the Rev. Mr. Okumura, it is essential that greater efforts be made to Americanize the younger Japanese who are growing into the franchise.' This was good advice, and that it is a matter of importance is apparent when we find that the estimated population of Hawaii on June 30, 1918, was 256,180," that is two years before your estimate, "an increase of 64,271, or 33.49 per cent, since the census of 1910. The population of the islands is divided as follows: Hawaiian, 22,850; part Hawaiian, 16,100; Portuguese, 24,250; Spanish, 2,270; Porto Ricans, 5,000; other Caucasians, 30,400; Chinese, 22,250; Japanese, 106,800; Filipinos, 20,400; all others, 5,560. The total number of births during the year was 9,204. The total number of pupils attendant on the public schools in the Territory on December 31, 1916, was 39,024. Of this number 14,440 were Japanese, 40,070 were Chinese, 1,795 were Americans, 3,914 were native Hawaiians, and 4,918 were part Hawaiians."

Of course, that may be the situation. If it is, it shows that over half of the population of the Territory of Hawaii are aliens ineligible to citizenship, and at the present time you are having a lot of trouble out there. The Japanese are striking on your sugar plantations and in other industries. The Japanese want more money than the planters and sugar mills want to give them. I understand that there is a proposition that 40,000 Chinamen should be imported into Hawaii to meet the labor situation. Of course, if you imported 40,000 Chinamen there would be simply 40,000 more ineligible to citizenship. I would like to see every Territory in the United States become a State when the time comes that it is eligible and qualified, and while you have the population necessary for a Representative in Congress and a few of the present States have been admitted with as small a population as you have at the present time, at least the population of those States is American, and in your Territory of Hawaii less than half of them are American citizens or eligible to become American citizens. Without the law or the Constitution is changed, prohibiting children of aliens ineligible to citizenship from exercising the franchise—and it does not look as though it would be—in a few years the voting population of Hawaii will be in the hands of the children of aliens who are themselves not eligible to citizenship, and we would have created right in the middle of the Pacific a Japanese State ready made, for the use of the Japanese Government in case of trouble between the two countries. The orientals, having the voting strength in a few years, would naturally hold the offices were Hawaii admitted as a State.

How serious this matter has become, Mr. Chairman, is well illustrated by the remarks of Senator PHELAN, of California, on the floor of the Senate on February 27, 1920, when the naval bill was under discussion. I read from page 3578 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

There are now in the city of Washington the governor of the Hawaiian Territory and a delegation from the legislature, and I learn from them in conversation that the conditions in the islands are very critical; that there is a strike among the Japanese, who comprise one-half of the entire population of the islands; that there are 120,000 Japanese in the islands, and they are on a strike, and their consuls, it has been discovered, have agents in every camp who report to them. In order to make the strike effective notice has been sent out by the unions composed of Japanese that in case any Japanese refuses to join in the strike he shall be reported to the burgomaster of his native cantonment, or whatever political subdivision it is, in Japan; and great pressure, which seems almost to be of an official character, is put upon these men to join the strike—against whom? Against the white planters.

These Hawaiians say that the white planters will not yield. Already, they state, 14 cane fires have been started in the different plantations. They are using the method of sabotage and the destruction of property to bring about the accomplishment of their purposes; and I am told that a Japanese warship has just entered the harbor, ostensibly for the purpose of taking off Japanese who are willing to go back.

When the delegation that came here from Hawaii was not engaged in seeking relief from the vicious land system which has deprived the native population of its patrimony they were urging Congress to revise the labor laws in that oriental colony. And what form did their suggestion take; did it provide for Americanizing conditions on the plantations? No. Instead they asked that they be allowed to bring in a flood of Chinese coolies, so that they could play the Chinese against the Japanese. On page 40 of their hearings before the Senate Committee on Immigration they ask for only "a limited number of Chinese to come to Hawaii, not to live permanently but for a period of five or seven years"; but in the bill introduced by the Delegate from that Territory during the last Congress they are more specific. That bill reads as follows:

Whereas since the voluntary annexation by the United States of the Hawaiian Islands more than $30,000,000 has been expended for Army, Navy, and harbor improvements to the end that the strategic key to the Pacific Ocean be made a safe base of military operation; and

Whereas there are now garrisoned in the Territory of Hawaii upward of 10,000 men in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps branches of the military service; and

Whereas since the discontinuance of Chinese immigration the labor supply of the Territory has diminished to such an extent that large areas of lands, both public and private, suitable for the growing of rice, garden truck, and other edibles are now lying fallow, idle, and unimproved; and

Whereas the question of how to provision the Territory in the event of hostile demonstration against it has been carefully considered by the different commanders of the United States Army of the Department of Hawaii, efforts have been made to reestablish the planting of rice and other products on unemployed lands, but without success, because of the utter lack of suitable or available labor; and

Whereas there is no citizen or European labor available to relieve an acute and actual necessity, and without the improvement and cultivation of unemployed lands the scant food supply of the Territory of Hawaii, in the absence of a strong Pacific Ocean fleet, makes its 240,000 inhabitants early and easy prey to a blockading hostile fleet; and

Whereas the Chinese are the most skilled rice and garden-truck agriculturists now procurable; and

Whereas the condition obtaining in the Territory of climate, diversity of race, lack of skilled employment, complete isolation from the mainland, and noncompetition with either skilled or unskilled labor of the mainland, eliminate from serious consideration the many objections urged against general Chinese immigration; and

Whereas the admission of a limited number of Chinese laborers to the Territory of Hawaii upon such terms and conditions and under such special rules and restrictions as the Department of Labor might deem advisable would enable the Territory of Hawaii to plant and cultivate its unemployed lands in rice, garden truck, and other products, and thereby solve the now perilous food situation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States by apt legislation provide for the admission into the Territory of Hawaii from the Republic of China (without right to proceed to any other part of the United States), under such terms and conditions and subject to such rules and restrictions as it deems advisable, 30,000 Chinese laborers.

But Hawaii is not the only oriental dependency over which the American flag flies that is experiencing these troubles. Here is a cablegram that appeared in the New York Sun and Herald of Saturday, April 3:

FIGHT PHILIPPINE SALE TO JAPANESE—RESIDENTS IN RIZAL PROVINCE ENTER PROTEST.

MANILA, P. I., March 30 (delayed).

One thousand residents of Rizal Province, 20 miles from Manila, marched to Gov. Gen. Harrison's office here to-day and presented a protest against the sale of 10,000 acres of sugar-plantation lands to Japanese capitalists. The sale price was reported to be $250,000.

The former owners of the land are in Spain. Tenants have been notified by the new Japanese owners that they must vacate the property. Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Territorial senate, told the protestants that the matter would be considered by the next legislature.

There have also been grave labor troubles on the plantations in Porto Rico, although the oriental question does not enter there. In fact, I am informed that on that island the plantations are almost entirely owned by white men, and that the conditions there somewhat approximate the conditions under which cane is raised in Louisiana. There are large plantations that grind their own cane and make their own sugar, and then there are numerous small holdings where the farmer raises his cane and sells it to the factory by the ton.

The continental sugar industry of America must not be destroyed. The cane crop of my section and the sugar-beet growers of the West constitute the continental sugar supply of these United States. We should never permit this industry to be destroyed, for, no matter what may become of all other sources of supply, this source is ever available to our people.

Sugar to-day is an essential in the life of the Nation. The catastrophe of the Great War practically destroyed the sugar-beet industry of Europe, and the islands surrounding America and ourselves were called upon to make good this deficiency. It is conceivable that a condition will arise under which sugar could not be imported from the islands, and then we would be dependent alone upon the sugar produced upon the continent.

Under normal conditions sugar can be produced much cheaper in the islands than it can upon the mainland. It can be produced, however, without violating the organic law of the land. It can be produced without making an oriental colony of any of these islands, and bringing the product of this coolie labor in direct conflict with the product of the free labor of the States. With this thought in view I introduced on May 19, 1919, H. R. 413, which reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 413) to regulate the interstate commerce of articles produced in the Territories, Districts, and other subdivisions of the United States in violation of the land laws of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person, partnership, or corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State thereof, or of any foreign country that has acquired and holds real estate in contravention of the laws of the United States in any Territory, District, or other political subdivision of the United States, shall be prohibited from disposing through interstate commerce of the product of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment conducted in conjunction with said real estate so unlawfully held.

The purpose of this act being that wherever land is held in these islands contrary to the organic law that the product thereof should not be permitted to enter into interstate commerce. My idea in introducing this act was to call attention to the very condition that has been brought out in the hearings before the Committee on the Territories.

Land in the Hawaiian Islands is being held by these great sugar corporations contrary to the organic law, in defiance of the statute, worked practically with slave labor, and the product is brought into the United States and sold in competition with the product of our free labor here; vast fortunes are being made by the exploiters and these fortunes are being made at the expense of the native Hawaiians and of the people of the United States.

Personally, I have no objection to any man or set of men accumulating money, but I protest when these fortunes are being piled up by the use of Asiatic labor, practically in a state of peonage, the natives being "carpetbagged" upon, and the life of the continental industry being threatened by and through such illegal and lawless acts.

If ever the American Sugar Trust, acting through its subsidiaries in these islands, is able to destroy the continental sugar producer, then, indeed, will they have the American people at their mercy, and they will be able to make them pay whatever they choose for this necessity of life.

The one safety for the American consumer is to see to it that the continental sugar industry is permitted to live. There are millions and millions of acres of land in these United States susceptible of growing sugar cane and sugar beets. These acres ought to be brought under cultivation, and the people owe it to themselves to so legislate in the future as to guarantee for all time to come that the American people will never be at the mercy of the Sugar Trust alone for their supply of sugar.

The Department of Agriculture has officially reported that there is an area of 274,000,000 acres of land that are adapted, both by climatic conditions and the nature of the soil, to the successful production of the sugar beet within our continental borders. Secretary Wilson, in submitting these figures, added that—

Of course, a large part of this area is now occupied by woodlands, permanent pastures, cities and villages, farm homes, roads, rivers, etc., and considerable areas are too rough or too swampy for cultivation. It is neither possible nor necessary in this discussion to determine exactly what part of this area is at present actually improved. It is certain that the percentage of the cultivated ground is large and, moreover, that it is steadily increasing and will continue to increase so long as the density of population increases.

That prophecy of the Secretary has been abundantly fulfilled. He pointed out that at that time the average production of beet sugar per acre was 2,400 pounds, or about 1¼ short tons. In the decade that has followed production per acre has increased to slightly more than 1½ short tons.

The Bureau of Crop Estimates reports that during the year 1919 only 692,455 acres out of the 274,000,000 acres of the soil that is suitable for the production of sugar beets was devoted to that industry.

It has been estimated that last year—1919—the total consumption of sugar in the United States amounted to 4,067,671 tons, and of this amount the beet fields furnished 872,253 tons and the cane fields of Louisiana, where there was the worst crop failure in the history of the industry, furnished, with the addition of the small Texas crop, 154,034 tons, making a total tonnage produced in continental United States of 1,026,287 tons, or approximately one-quarter of our consumption. There was brought in from Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Hawaii, and the Philippines 882,501 tons, and the remaining 2,159,883 tons were imported from abroad, principally from Cuba. There is an average of 225,000 acres of land in Louisiana devoted to the cultivation of cane for conversion into sugar, and that represents only a small part of the area that is available and would probably be planted to cane following the inauguration of a policy for the production upon the continent of our necessary supply of sugar.

The records of the Department of Agriculture show that the average of production from cane in this country is slightly in excess of a ton of sugar to the acre, although it may exceed that figure on some of the better managed plantations.

Sugar cane will grow in all parts of Florida, and in the section of that State below the frost line the sucrose content of the cane is equal or superior to that grown in Cuba. It is therefore safe to assume that should a settled policy with respect to the home production of our sugar supply be inaugurated the production of cane in Florida would in a short time equal the Louisiana crop.

It is easy to see, therefore, that there are ample cane and beet lands to supply our people with all the home-grown sugar necessary to meet their wants, and make them immune to the uncertainty of an overseas supply.

If the World's War proved any one fact more than another it was this: That the safety of a nation attacked lies in its ability to produce its food supplies within its own borders. And in no other article of food was this so clearly demonstrated as in the case of sugar. The Central Powers did not want for sugar when their people were suffering for almost every other item of food, because the governments of those powers had for many years preceding the outbreak of hostilities developed the production of sugar to such a point that they had all that was necessary for their people to consume and surplus stocks for export. But early in the war England and her allies began to experience the most acute sufferings because their sugar supplies were cut off, and as the war dragged on through the years that pinch for sugar was even felt severely in this country. The reason for this lay in the fact that nearly all of the supplies of England, France, Italy, and the countries that were allied with them, had to be imported from across the seas, and the German submarines sank many of those cargoes as soon as they entered European waters.

It will be remembered that almost all of the early cargo ships leaving this country that were destroyed either by submarines or by bombs concealed in the cargo were vessels that carried sugar from our own meager stock to England and France. But this was not the only difficulty with respect to obtaining sugar that the Allies had to contend with. While they were suffering acutely from the sugar shortage hundreds of thousands of tons were piled high in the warehouses of Java and other distant fields, but the journey to those places was too long to permit of vessels being sent to convey it to Europe or even to this country.

All available tonnage was required to transport troops, munitions, and necessary supplies to the battle fields, and the world had to witness the tantalizing spectacle of practically all of Christendom being placed on a meager monthly ration of sugar while almost unlimited supplies were available in the distant islands of the seas and in far-away tropical countries, but it was impossible to send the ships to those distant seas in order to secure it.

The cordon that was drawn around England by the German submarines, the daily sinking of cargo ships in the Irish Sea, the English Channel, and the other waters surrounding the "tight little island" shows how absolutely impossible it is in this day of submarine warfare for any nation to depend upon overseas sources for its supplies of food in time of war. It is therefore, Mr. Chairman, no exaggeration to say that with our extended coast line and with our dependence upon far-away possessions and foreign nations for our supply of sugar, that should, by any unfortunate turn of circumstances, we find ourselves in the position that England and France have so recently occupied, we would, like them, suffer from an acute shortage of sugar just as they did. It is no far stretch of the imagination to anticipate such a situation in the present unsettled condition of world affairs, much as we all hate to think of it. It is therefore the part of wise statesmanship to guard against such a possibility by taking the necessary steps now in time of peace to inaugurate a policy that will enable us to grow, within our own borders a supply of this necessity of life that will be sufficient for our people should we find ourselves again at war. In doing this we will simply be following in the recent footsteps of those who have learned by experience, because as a result of the harrowing experience through which her people have recently gone, Great Britain has at last set about to establish in a serious way a policy of producing a home-grown supply of sugar in the British Isles. French statesmæn and economists are also looking to the rehabilitation and expansion of the sugar industry in that country, and in fact, the leading men of all nations, as a result of the terrible experience through which the world has just passed, are seeking to develop this necessary crop in their lands.

I speak from the standpoint of a consumer and not a producer of sugar. I speak from the standpoint of one whose motives can not be assailed on the grounds of personal interest. I have not a dollar invested in the sugar industry either directly or indirectly.

I speak, however, also from a personal knowledge of the sugar section of my State, as I was born and raised in the largest sugar-producing parish in Louisiana. I know the troubles and the misfortunes of the people engaged in that industry. I know how they have had to fight their battles, not only against the forces of nature, and have had to face not only the normal vicissitudes of all agricultural pursuits, but in addition thereto have had to fight for their very existence against the machinations of the trust that would destroy them for its own purposes, but also they have had to bear the burden of hostile legislation in the past. Knowing this industry as I do, I say without any degree of hesitation that it is one of the great agricultural industries of this country worthy of your most serious consideration.

The future of the continental sugar producing is in your hands, and when the time comes for action on your part be not swayed by statements of temporary benefit, be not swayed by statements emanating from selfish sources, but approach the subject in the broad spirit of Americanism and do that which is best for all the people of America, remembering at all times that a constant supply of sugar is essential to the life of the Nation, and that to destroy the continental source of supply may under circumstances easily imagined deprive the American people of this prime necessity. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BABKA].

Mr. BABKA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, we have passed another May Day without a serious outbreak on the part of the reds in this country, although there are many who would like to turn the day into a carnival of crime the world over and start the revolution.

However, the Bolshevist propaganda is getting in its work. You will hear a kind word for the experiment in Russia occasionally in almost any circle of society. You can hear the soviet rule heartily indorsed by some in all walks of life. You can find enthusiastic advocates of Bolshevism in this country if you care to look them up, and you need not leave Washington, D. C., to do it. And you may find some on the pay roll of the Government.

Bolshevist propaganda is being circulated in this country in large quantities and in unsuspecting ways.

The high-toned stuff finds its way to the Congressman's desk and into many offices and homes. It is well printed on good paper and carries the air of respectability. It talks of great business opportunities for capital in Russia. It tells little of bloodshed and revolution, but pictures the beautiful Utopia which Bolshevism has given to the world in the shape of soviet Russia. It boasts of freedom and equality, of a Government that relieves the individual of all initiative and responsibility. It appeals to American manufacturers and capitalists to open up negotiations and reap a harvest, and offers an easy peace with all the world. This class of propaganda gets into our best magazines. An official soviet weekly journal of this high-toned class is circulated in this country—Soviet Russia.

Quite another sort of propaganda is being spread in other circles. It is the anarchistic, revolutionary, red ink stuff. It urges the proletariat to arise and conquer the world, to start the general strike, to end the capitalistic reign, to take over the property that is theirs. This sort of propaganda is circulated in the dark and in underground ways. It breeds discontent, strikes, riots, bloodshed, revolution, war. Such printed matter has been gathered up by the ton by secret service men. But meetings are being held regularly at which Bolshevism is preached openly. Societies are being formed, newspapers and magazines are published in the interest of revolution.

Of course this sort of talk is not new. Communism has been talked for a hundred years. Karl Marx was its leading advocate about 1847. The Marx theories have been advocated by Socialists in all civilized countries for 70 or 80 years. But about as far as this social revolution ever got, until recently, was the murder of some king, prince, or president by a crazy anarchist.

The people have become accustomed to the shrieks of the anarchist and they pay far too little attention to the dangers of the day. Russia is far away and the story of the red revolution reads like a story book—even like a Dickens or a Carlisle on the French revolution of another century. It does not sound like an affair of our day—so the majority of people give it little serious consideration.

I believe that the subject of Soviet Russia and her propaganda, as well as communistic activities in America, should be considered in every club, organization, and gathering in America. Let's look the question straight in the face.

If the majority of our people like the soviet system, it can be had peaceably. If we don't like the "dictatorship of the proletariat" let's combat it at every turn of the road. Let's stamp out red Bolshevism in the United States.

In times past we have had only the wild theories of imaginative writers to consider. We could look only on dream pictures of communistic utopias.

But to-day we have before us a living—or dying—example of the real thing. We can look at and analyze and study a great country ruled by communists-bolsheviki. A practical example of the dictatorship of the proletariat. In his wildest dreams Karl Marx could not have drawn up a system of government more to his liking.

In our study of soviet Russia, fortunately we do not have to depend upon newspaper reports alone for our information. The United States Senate has held several notable investigations which have brought out much reliable information about soviet Russia and Bolshevik propaganda in the United States. Several thousand pages of hearings have been printed and you can read what people have to say of it under oath. Many of those who testified in these hearings have been identified with the Bolshevik government of Russia. You can take their testimony alone and draw a pretty good picture of soviet Russia and the red rule.

A few facts stand out prominently in this Russian Bolshevik experiment.

The Government is what Lenin has tried to make it—a dictatorship of the proletariat. It is run by and in the interest of the propertyless class.

The incidents of the several revolutions leading up to the present dictatorship are history that will be read with increasing interest as the years go by.

The reign of terror which accompanied the establishment of this dictatorship and placed at the head of this great crumbling nation this pair of political pirates, anarchistic fanatics, is more or less known and may be passed over here. The fact that between 50,000 and 100,000 people of the property-holding class were murdered in cold blood and that perhaps 1,000,000 others have been driven from the country is a mere incident in the revolution, and perhaps has been found necessary in the process of making Russia safe for this new form of autocracy.

The interest Germany has shown in aiding Lenin in his work of establishing his new government is of little importance in this discussion.

So we will pass over these disagreeable scenes and take a close-up view of the Russian Social Federal Soviet Republic, as it is officially called, and see how we like it and how the system would work out if adopted in our own country.

The term Bolsheviki is merely the name of the political party which is now in control of affairs in Russia.

Soviet is the name used for council, legislature, congress.

A committee called the soviet controls the affairs of the factory, mine, bank, or store. A body of men called the soviet make and administer the laws for a village, a city, a county, a Province. The All-Russian Congress of Soviets is the national body. This body is composed of about 1,500 men. It meets every 3 months for a session of 10 days or 2 weeks. It passes upon all the decrees and orders and laws made by the executive committee. This national body is too large for working purposes, so from it is selected an executive committee of from 200 to 250. This body assumes the function, more or less, of our own National Congress. The executive committee selects the cabinet, composed of 18 members, each the head of a department. The cabinet has large powers. Lenin and Trotski are members of the cabinet, Lenin being premier and secretary of foreign affairs; Trotski is secretary of war and head of the army.

In our own country it is a well-known fact that every American citizen has a vote for every officer elected, from alderman up to President. But if the United States were being operated under the soviet Russian constitution, your voting privilege would work out about like this:

You as an individual would vote for your town councilman or city alderman, and then you would go back to work and forget about your government. It would take care of itself as it does in this free (?) country of boasted equality—Russia.

Members of the city or town council would select the members of the State legislature. The State legislature would select the Members of the National Congress. The National Congress would select its executive committee of 250. The executive committee would select the Cabinet of 18. The Cabinet would be dominated by the premier, probably, and he would run your Government for you. That is about the way it is worked out in the constitution of soviet Russia.

I believe I said that you would have the pleasure of voting for members of your town or city council or soviet; but let us see if you would if the Russian plan were carried out in our country.

In Russia everybody, men and women, 18 years old and over can vote, EXCEPT—and I quote from the constitution:

"Persons using hired labor for the sake of profit.

"Persons living on unearned increment, such as interest on capital, income from industrial enterprises, and property, etc.

"Private traders, trading and commercial agents.

"Monks and ecclesiastical servants of churches and religious cults.

"Employees and agents of the former police, of the special corps of gendarmes, and of branches of secret police department, and also members of the former reigning house of Russia.

"Persons duly recognized as mentally afflicted or insane, as well as persons placed in charge of guardians.

"Persons sentenced for crimes of speculation and bribery to a term fixed by law or by a judicial sentence."

Examine that closely and see if you could vote. In my district it would cut out a good many of the leading citizens in city, village, and in the farming districts.

In Russia the great majority of the people live in the country on farms. So, to make it absolutely certain that the workingmen of the industrial centers may have a majority of the Congress, representation is based on this apportionment—one member in the rural districts for each 125,000 people and in the cities and industrial cities one member for each 25,000 people. That is, a voting worker in a factory town is as good at the polls as five peasants on the farms.

So much for the form of government. What has this dictatorship of the proletariat done for the people?

It has nationalized the lands.

No one can own any land in Russia. It is all owned by the State. The town houses are divided up among the officeholders and poorer people by the local soviet and the farm lands are parceled out among the farmers by the rural soviet. No man can have more land than he can work himself. He can not employ farm help. He may work his parcel of land so long as the soviet permits him, and when he is too old longer to produce a crop he is removed to the town's poorhouse or given a pension.

It has nationalized railroads, manufacturing plants, banks, insurance companies, newspapers, mines—all industries, in fact.

It has not exactly nationalized women, but its marriage laws are a joke, and it is as easy to get married or get a divorce in Russia as it is to pay a dog tax in our country.

After several weeks of hearings, in which some strong friends of the Bolsheviki testified and defended the system, the Senate committee published a report, in which it set forth briefly and in short paragraphs just what Bolshevism had accomplished in Russia and what it would mean to this country if it got a hold here.

Here are the conclusions of the Senate committee:

WHAT BOLSHEVISM HAS ACCOMPLISHED IN RUSSIA AND WOULD DO TO THE UNITED STATES.

"1. The repudiation of democracy and the establishment of a dictatorship.

"2. The confiscation of all land and the improvements thereon.

"8. The confiscation of all newspapers and periodicals and all mechanical facilities and machinery used in the publication thereof.

"9. The seizure and confiscation of all public meeting places and assembly halls.

"10. The confiscation of all transportation and communication systems.

"11. The confiscation of the entire estate of all decedents.

"23. The disfranchisement of all persons employing any other person in connection with their business.

"24. The disfranchisement of all persons receiving rent, interest, or dividends.

"25. The disfranchisement of all merchants, traders, and commercial agents.

"27. The denial of the existence of any inalienable rights in the individual citizen.

"28. The establishment of a judicial system exercising autocratic power, convicting persons, and imposing penalties in their absence and without opportunity to be heard, and even adopting the death penalty for numerous crimes and misdemeanors.

"29. The inauguration of a reign of fear, terrorism, and violence."

Of course the dictatorship of the proletariat was first established by the sword and bayonet, and is maintained by the red army. Mr. Lenin, the dictator, who has long been a disciple of Karl Marx, had the opportunity of writing the laws for this new communist government without much interference from parliamentary bodies. The constitution and laws are the work of idealists—dreamers.

Russia is to-day as nearly a perfect communist government as its leaders can make it. There she stands in all her misery, that other nations may look upon her and see how they like the sample.

In the past we have had only the glowing pictures of Utopian dreams drawn by imaginative writers to contemplate. But to-day we can look at starving Russia, a country of extensive domain and 180,000,000 people, absolutely governed, controlled, and dominated by communists.

What would the communists, or Bolsheviki, or the I. W. W. do to this country if they ever got control?

Well, there is Russia. You can see what they have done to her. They would undoubtedly endeavor to do as much for us.

I do not think for one single minute that Bolshevism in any form will ever get control in this country.

But the reason that it will not is no fault of its friends. The reason is that the common people of America are wise, intelligent, and are on guard.

However, Bolshevism, now sulking in the dark in America, may show its head some unhappy day. That it has many supporters in America this very day is a well-known fact.

I have heard a United States official who had been in Russia say that there were more real Bolshevists in the United States to-day than there are in Russia. He estimates that there are no more than 300,000 real, sincere Bolshevists in Russia, and that these 300,000 rule that country through the red army and the red terror. He estimates that there are at least 300,000 Bolshevists in the United States.

The Senate hearings brought out some interesting things, showing the close relationship between the Bolshevists of Russia and the United States. Albert R. Williams, a communist back from Russia, stated that there are 100,000 people in Russia who have lived in the United States and at least 5,000 of these are connected with the soviet government. He said that you can go into a soviet meeting anywhere in Russia and ask for some one who can speak English and you will find one or more persons who have been in this country and have returned to Russia. Strange to say, these folks have not carried back to Russia an exalted opinion of our form of government. Mr. Williams says that the soviet form of government, so far as it originated in the mind of one man, was planned by an American, Daniel de Leon.

Others have testified that there are 500,000 Russians in New York City to-day and many of them are Left Wing Socialists and communists. The Federation of Russian Workers in America is made up of various unions and organizations of Russian workers. These people are practically all communists. They are all in hearty sympathy with Bolshevik Russia.

John Reed, well known in Colorado for his radical publicity during the coal strike in 1914, testified before this committee that he had been in Russia several times, had aided the Bolshevik government in its propaganda, and had interpreted into English many of the decrees used at the hearings. This same John Reed was in Chicago as late as August 31, 1919, when he helped to organize the Communist Labor Party of America. Reed has since returned to Russia.

Ludwig C. A. K. Martens, duly appointed "representative in the United States of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic," has given some interesting testimony before a Senate committee. Since January, 1919, he has maintained official headquarters in New York and Washington. He has an admitted staff of 35 people, most all communists of more or less note. He contends that his chief business in America is to encourage trade with Russia. But he has spoken before many of the most radical societies in New York and elsewhere, has contributed to the radical press, and has been in close touch with many of the radicals in and out of jail in this country.

Couriers pass back and forth between soviet Russia and America carrying money and messages to and reports from Mr. Martens.

Every now and then Lenin issues a broadside to his comrades in America urging them to arise and take possession of the earth—which is theirs.

In Russia the Bolshevik propaganda ran something like this:

To the soldiers: "You want peace; that is simple—shoot your officers and go home."

To the peasant: "You want the land; there it lies—the estates of the landed proprietors and the former Czar. Take the land; it is yours."

To the workmen in factory and mine: "Take possession of the land and its product; operate it to your own profit; it is yours."

These admonitions are not far different from many heard by the radical leaders of disorder in our own land.

Russian Bolshevism, with all its agencies and supporters in America, will make little headway as such.

But we should not shut our eyes to the real danger of serious trouble from the radicals in this country.

The great majority of the members of organized labor in this country are not Bolshevists nor communists and do not believe in abolishing personal-property rights. All labor, organized and unorganized, is anxious, of course, to improve wages and living conditions, which is certainly a recognized right.

I believe that the majority of the leaders of the labor-union movements in the country are loyal to the country and are opposed to communism.

But working within many of the unions are men who are openly seeking to disrupt the unions, openly espousing the cause of the various revolutionary programs, and active in their efforts to start the general strike. Wherever a strike is called that bids fair to amount to anything, you find these men and the evidence of their work. It was so in Winnepeg, in Seattle, in the coal strikes, in the recent steel strike, and most apparent in the present outlaw railroad strike.

Fortunately for them, these men do not all write out their thoughts and plans. But some do, and the hearings before the Senate committee contain many pages of incendiary literature put out by these men and their organizations.

One strike leader, whose name has been much in the papers recently, wrote a book a few years ago, which, I dare say, he now wishes had never been put into print, for it rises up to haunt him wherever he starts out to conduct a modern strike in an orderly (?) way. I refer, of course, to William Z. Foster, who, in conjunction with Earl C. Ford, issued a book on Syndicalism in 1912.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of "an orderly strike conducted in a modern way." I want to ask him if there is any such thing as "an orderly strike in a modern way"?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that I will insert a question mark after the word "orderly" when I revise my remarks for the printer.

Mr. BLANTON. That will be better, then.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to read to the committee what Mr. Foster says, but I shall not in order to save time, but I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Foster was a free lance for a while, but more recently announced the policy of "boring within" the regular unions as the best way to make progress.

There is much in Mr. Foster's little book that would be illuminating to you gentlemen, showing the viewpoint of a bunch of agitators working in the name of labor before the name Bolshevik became a household term. But all I can take time to read you is a part of the chapter on "The general strike."

Mr. Foster says of the purposes and operation of "THE GENERAL STRIKE.

"By the term 'general strike,' used in a revolutionary sense, is meant the period of more or less general cessation of labor by the workers, during which period the workers by disorganizing the mechanism of capitalist society will expose its weakness and their own strength; whereupon, perceiving themselves possessed of the power to do so they will seize control of the social means of production and proceed to operate them in their own interest instead of in the interest of a handful of parasites, as heretofore. The general strike is the first stage of the revolution proper.

"The everyday tactics of the workers strongly indicate the truth of the conclusion that they will expropriate the capitalists as soon as they learn they have the power to do so. In their daily strikes they pit their strength against that of their employers and wring from them whatever concessions they can. They do not remain long content with these concessions, and as soon as they are able they proceed to win more. They are insatiable, and when the general strike proves their ability to do so they will have no scruples against expropriating the capitalists. This expropriation will seem the more natural to them then, as they will be fortified by the syndicalist conception that the capitalists are thieves and have no 'right' to their property.

"The wealthy capitalists themselves will also need generous guards.

"Syndicalists in every country are already actively preparing this disorganization of the armed forces by carrying on a double educational campaign among the workers. On the one hand they are destroying their illusions about the sacredness of capitalist property and encouraging them to seize this property wherever they have the opportunity. On the other they are teaching working-class soldiers not to shoot their brothers and sisters who are in revolt, but, if need be, to shoot their own officers and to desert the army when the crucial moment arrives. This double propaganda of contempt for capitalist property 'rights' and antimilitarism is inseparable from the propagation of the general strike.

"In all probability the general strike, at least in its incipient stages, will follow the course that any number of modern great strikes have taken. Only a small part of the workers will be organized. This organized fraction, under some strong stimulus, will provoke a great strike; vast masses of unorganized workers seeing an opportunity to better their conditions and caught in the general contagion of revolt will join the strike, organizing themselves meanwhile. The strike will spread, society will be paralyzed, and the revolutionary workers, perceiving their power, will proceed to put an end to capitalism.

"The success of the general strike does not necessitate the voluntary striking of every worker. Modern industry is so delicately adjusted and the division of labor so complete that if the bulk of the workers in a few of the so-called strategic industries—transportation, coal mining, steel making, etc.—quit work the rest of the workers would be forced to do likewise through lack of materials and markets for their products. No doubt the workers forced to quit thus, who would be mostly unorganized, unskilled, and the oppressed of the oppressed, would readily fall in with the program of the revolutionists once the general strike was well under way."

I could read you pages of modern hair-raising stuff from notorious citizens such as Morris Hillquit, who came near being mayor of New York City, Bill Haywood, Vincent St. John, and John Reed, all three of whom are well known in Colorado, and from the platforms of the Communist and Socialist Parties, the constitution of the I. W. W., from the propaganda of the communist socialist federations, and other radical societies in the big cities to show you that the manifestoes of Lenin and Trotski have nothing on some of our own radicals for sheer anarchy, except that the pronouncements of the two notorious Russians have the effect of law, but the limit on my time forbids.

Out in the country, where the questions of capital and labor are discussed, the term capitalist is wrongly construed as meaning some imaginary individual who has accumulated or inherited millions or billions of dollars. He is far away in the dim distance and the extermination of his race would mean little inconvenience to most of our people.

But the fight of the Bolshevist, the syndicalist, the I. W. W., the communist, the radical, is not directed exclusively against such. It is directed against and would overthrow the system of property ownership, the system by which you have saved up enough money from your work to buy a home which you hope to leave to your son or daughter, by which through thrift, hard work, and enterprise you own your farm, or your store, or your little shop, or stock in the local canning factory, or flour mill, or mine, or oil well, or bank. The new order of things would confiscate your savings-bank deposits, your insurance policy, your investments, your Liberty bonds. It would put the thrifty farmer, the ambitious working man, the successful merchant, on a level with the tramp, the sluggard, the shiftless, the rowdy.

In theory it would do all that.

In the light of practical experience of the recent past, as well as of all ages, the revolution or the general strike would turn government into chaos, in which the dictatorship of brute force would take the place of law and reason.

Never in the history of all the world has civilization risen so high as it has in this country this very year, and never has the opportunity been so great for the boy of lowly birth. Never has the working man of any country in any age been so liberally rewarded, nor has he been able to enjoy so many of the luxuries of life, as he has in America in recent years.

The man who labors and who would have his loved ones about him in his own home, ambitious for their future opportunities and happiness, should consider well before he lets the seed of discontent sowed by the apostles of darkness take lodgment in his heart. [Applause.]

In their own interest union men should purge their unions of the syndicalist, the I. W. W., and the advocates of the general strike, and laboring men of all classes should cling to the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution.

All liberty-loving men and women in America are proud of their country and their Constitution, the greatest document of its kind ever written by man, and should aid in every lawful manner to rid the country of those who preach confiscation and violence and would overthrow the Government by force.

As for Russia, she will in time right herself. Either the people will rise and overthrow the usurpers of authority now in control or the present ruling class will grow conservative and rewrite the laws in an effort to keep possession of the lands and wealth they have stolen from others.

It was ever thus—the easiest way to keep an anarchist from burning down the town is to induce him to buy a home in the town. A Socialist with two pigs does not believe in dividing up the pigs. America's safeguard is in her great body of home-owning people. Our greatest weapon of defense against bolshevism and kindred ills is to keep wide open the doors of opportunity.

At the same time we should close our gates to the aliens who would come here to preach violence, anarchy, and revolution; and the citizen who advocates sabotage, the "general strike," syndicalism, and revolution, individually or in the name of some radical group or organization, is no better than a common criminal and should be treated as such. [Applause.]

Poor Russia! It matters not what circle of society you move in, nor how you earn your daily bread, the more you look into Soviet Russia the more thankful you will be that you live in America, and the more anxious to keep America clean. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, the hour is getting late, and having no desire to intrude upon the time of the House any more than it is necessary, I therefore ask unanimous consent to be permitted to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, we have now under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, the last of the great appropriation bills to be considered by the House during this session. I would not take the time of the House at this time were it not for the fact that the very distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, recently made two statements with which I can not agree and which I feel should not go unchallenged. First, he stated that because the Committee on Appropriations had refused to appropriate the full amounts estimated by the several departments that the Committee on Appropriations, which is in the control of the Republicans, had thereby saved the taxpayers in round figures about $1,500,000,000. If the reasoning of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] should be followed to its logical conclusion, then the Democrats are entitled to credit for saving to the taxpayers of the country during a recent session of Congress, when they were in control, between five and six billions of dollars, this being the amount they had cut from the estimates of the several departments. The other statement is this—and I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 1, page 6413. In the discussion of the reduction of expenses Mr. GOOD said:

> In making these reductions the several appropriation committees of Congress have not been unmindful of the needs of the various branches of the Government service. The reductions will not prevent the healthful and vigorous functioning of every needed governmental activity.

For about a quarter of a century the laboring people of the United States had been advocating the creation of a Department of Labor, with a Secretary as a member of the President's Cabinet. The Congress of the United States, believing that this was a proper thing to do, finally enacted a law creating the Department of Labor, and the Hon. W. B. Wilson, a former honored and distinguished Member of this House, was appointed by President Wilson as the first Secretary of Labor.

As I sat here during this Congress I have wondered why the appropriations to the Department of Labor have been cut to the bone by the Committee on Appropriations. I never knew the reason until the chairman of the committee told the House the other day that the Department of Labor was not "a needed governmental activity." Some of us have had our suspicions as to why these appropriations had been cut, but never did any Member of this House on either side of the aisle, nor did any person occupying the high, responsible position of chairman of the Committee on Appropriations intimate, if not directly charge, that the Department of Labor was not "a needed governmental activity."

I received on last Friday afternoon a letter from a man by the name of Williams, a representative of the Machinists' Union, residing in Allentown, Pa., in which he claimed that because of the cut made in the appropriations to the Department of Labor a man by the name of Angelo, unknown to me, was compelled to discontinue his activities as administrator of an award made by the National War Labor Board in a decision rendered by that body in the case of the Bethlehem Steel Co. against their employees, and that because of this fact in all probability the employees, who had honestly earned this money and which rightfully belonged to them, may be deprived of about one million and a half dollars in wages earned during the war.

I went to the Department of Labor on Saturday last to see if the statements contained in that letter were correct. I could hardly believe that such a condition could exist. I talked with the chief of the conciliation division in the department, and he informed me that the statements made by Mr. Williams were correct. I asked him if it were not possible to find enough money to pay the wages of this man until this award had been administered, and he said he was very sorry to be compelled to say no, that this could not be done.

The importance of this matter may appeal to the Members of the House, even though it does not appeal to the members of the Committee on Appropriations, when you understand that the War Department and the Navy Department have officially accepted this man as an official representative of the National War Labor Board and have agreed to recognize him as a person who has the right to certify to these departments the amount of money due the men working in the Bethlehem Steel plants. Of course, the Machinists' Union could pay this man his salary. Outsiders who want to see justice done those employees could pay his salary. But neither the War Department nor the Navy Department would be justified in accepting a certification made to it for the payment of Government funds by an interested party or by a party whose salary was paid by any other than the Government of the United States.

I asked the man in charge of the Division of Conciliation if it were not possible that some other commissioner of conciliation be assigned to this work. I was informed that this could not be done, because this man had laid out the plans for this investigation; he had already prepared a partial report, as I understand it, and it would be impossible for a new man to go in there and take up this work at this time; and to my great surprise I was further informed that notwithstanding all of the unrest throughout the country, which we hear so much about on this floor day in and day out, that already the department had been compelled to furlough a number of its commissioners through lack of appropriation, and that unless something unforeseen happened the Secretary of Labor would be compelled to lay off every commissioner of conciliation the first week in June and wait until the appropriations for this work are available at the beginning of the next fiscal year on July 1.

It may be, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that this is not "a needed governmental activity," but I want to say to you, my colleagues, that I know of no department of the United States Government, nor do I know of any branch or division of any of the departments of the United States Government, that are as essential to the welfare and well-being and the stabilizing influences of the country as the Department of Labor and its Division of Conciliation. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman mean to say there were any estimates in this bill for the commissioners of conciliation in the Department of Labor?

Mr. CASEY. No, I do not; but I do deny the statement of the gentleman from Iowa when he says that in making these reductions the several appropriating committees of the Congress have not been unmindful of the needs of the various activities of the Government service, and that the reductions will not prevent the vigorous functioning of every needed governmental activity.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the transportation act very largely relieved the commissioners of conciliation of all their activities with regard to disputes in transportation companies?

Mr. CASEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not aware of anything of the kind; neither is the gentleman from Iowa aware of anything of the kind, because it is not so.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the transportation act did not provide for a labor board to adjust those disputes?

Mr. CASEY. I mean to say it does provide for such a board, and I mean to say also that you carry in this very bill now under consideration an item for the Board of Mediation and Conciliation on railroad matters, which is entirely separate and apart from the Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the board recently appointed by the President under the provisions of the transportation act have lately applied for an appropriation of $400,000 for next year, claiming that they would take over all the work of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation of the Labor Department so far as disputes in connection with railroad and transportation companies are concerned.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the committee, knows that the board recently created by the railroad act can not take from the Secretary of Labor the right as provided for in the organic act creating the Department of Labor, which makes the Secretary of Labor a commissioner of mediation and conciliation. The gentleman knows that the only work this new labor board will take over will be the mediation and conciliation work of that particular branch of the Railroad Administration with which the Department of Labor had nothing to do. They had their own mediators and conciliators. The great difficulty about this whole matter is that either those who are charged with the responsibility of making proper appropriation for this work do not understand or they do not want to understand what the proper functions of the Department of Labor are and its proper activities.

I want to say to you frankly that I have no desire to be understood as in any way attempting to make a partisan speech on this matter. I am only interested in seeing that justice is done to this department that represents the wage earners of the land. Money can be appropriated by the millions and hundreds of millions to the Department of Justice and to the War Department to put men in jails and penitentiaries, and to shoot them down if they go on strike, but no money can be appropriated for the legitimate activities of the Department of Labor, whose function and duty it is to prevent those strikes. [Applause.]

There are two schools of thought on this question in this country. One is to put the fear of might into the hearts of the workers, the Prussian system; and I am sorry to say that I am afraid that that line of thought is making too much progress in this land of ours to be advantageous to it.

The other school of thought is that we should by education, mediation, and conciliation prevent those industrial conflicts as far as it is possible to do so, and there is not a governmental activity of the United States that has the right under the law to take up these matters other than the Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor.

I also hear much said about our immigration officials, about the reversal of some decisions rendered by commissioners of immigration, by the Assistant Secretary of Labor. I know nothing about the merits of these controversies. I do not know whether the Assistant Secretary of Labor is justified in his position or not, but I do know that the laws of the land provide that the commissioners of immigration shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I also know that because of a lack of appropriations by this Congress to the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor these responsible commissioners of immigration have had to leave their official stations and go out through the land acting as commissioners of conciliation in an effort to try to keep down this industrial unrest that we have so much of throughout the country. I also know that the assistant commissioners of immigration have been compelled to leave their stations and go out and act as commissioners of conciliation, because of a lack of appropriations by this Congress to the Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor. I do not say that it is a fact, but it is just possible that because of your failure to appropriate properly for the Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor you have made it necessary for these responsible commissioners of immigration and assistant commissioners of immigration to leave their posts and go out and try to keep down the unrest and to settle these strikes that come up from time to time; it is just possible you have contributed more to this mix-up in the Bureau of Immigration than anybody I know of. But I hear men talk on this floor about labor and about the Department of Labor.

Those labor baiters and labor haters who abuse the high privileges of their responsible position on the floor of the House of Representatives by their actions are creating more socialists, I. W. W.'s, bolshevists, and anarchists than all the propaganda these people could spread throughout the country. [Applause.]

Congress should be legislating in the interest of the people and stop playing politics with this all-important labor question. It may be that men who have never had any training in or dealings with the labor movement of the country are better qualified to speak in its behalf than they are themselves. It may be that the man who is so obsessed with himself and with the opinion that the Congress of the United States should be used to crush and destroy the American labor movement is a better judge of what should be done for these people than they are; but I doubt it.

Woe be the day when those in this Congress and out of it who are seeking to destroy the American labor movement succeed. Once you destroy the militant, well-disciplined organization of wage earners of the United States, you are then inviting conditions similar to those in Russia that we hear so much about on this floor.

We are asked to appropriate millions and hundreds of millions of dollars for the Department of Agriculture, and I am satisfied that they should have every dollar that they can legitimately use.

But there seems to be a difference of opinion in the minds of some gentlemen on the floor of this House as to the advisability of taking care of the children of the land, the men and the women who produce the wealth of the land, and the animals on the farm. I am not going to take up the time of the House by discussing that phase of it, only to say that when you let the men and women who produce the wealth of this land of ours understand that the cattle in the fields are entitled to more consideration than they are, you will then be doing something that, in my judgment, is very dangerous and may come back to plague you.

Who uses this Division of Conciliation that we speak of? Is it a labor-organization institution? Do the employees approve of it? Do the employers approve of it? Do the civic bodies, such as the chambers of commerce and other similar activities, approve of the Division of Conciliation? I am not going to take the time to read the indorsements received from the large employers of the country. But I do want to say to you very frankly that there are large employers who are Members of this House who can testify to the efficiency and good work being done by the commissioners of conciliation of the Department of Labor. I have heard a great deal said by men who knew absolutely nothing about what they were talking, that the Department of Labor is a labor union organization; that the commissioners of conciliation go out and organize the workers into labor unions; and that they sandbag the employers into giving the employees an increase of wages and better conditions. I am not ready to say, because I do not know, whether there ever has been a man connected with the Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor who has done those things, but if there is such a person in the Division of Conciliation at the present time, no man in this House will do more to remove him from his position than I will, because that is no place for such a person.

Much has been said because some of these men are union men. They must be union men to some extent, because if they were not they could not get into the meetings of the labor organizations, nor would many of the labor organizations have any confidence in them. Many of the commissioners of conciliation are employers, and necessarily so, because many of the employers of the country will not meet with or transact business with a man who is a member of a labor union. The Secretary of Labor in his wisdom has selected as commissioners of conciliation men representing both side of the labor question. The commissioners of conciliation, in my judgment, are doing more to eliminate the industrial strife that we have in this country than any other governmental activity connected with the Government.

We hear much also about the Americanization of American workingmen. We are being called upon to spend hundreds of millions of dollars for a campaign of that character. The American workingman and the American working woman need no Americanization from the people who are preaching that propaganda. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. CASEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the few moments that I have I want to say to you frankly that in my judgment the best thing that this Congress can do and the succeeding Congresses can do is to recognize that the workers of the land have a right to organize into labor unions if they so desire; that the principle of collective bargaining should be recognized, because just as long as Congress and Members on this floor preach the doctrine that the employers have the right to organize and the right of collective bargaining, and the right to be represented by lawyers and others, and undertake to deny that same right to the workers of the land, you are doing something which, to say the least, will not be advantageous to the country. I have a telegram which I received from Mr. John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, in which he says:

> I am advised that Appropriation Committee in House has reduced appropriation for conciliation division, Department of Labor, to $100,000. I have in mind that the Department of Labor through this division is exercising a stabilizing influence in industry which can be effected in no other way. It is my sincere judgment that $100,000 is insufficient, and that a substantial service to the country can be rendered by increasing it.

It may be that men like Mr. Lewis, who is representing probably five or six hundred thousand miners of the country, do not understand these economic questions, but here is his telegram, and I want to say that the sentiment expressed in that telegram is the sentiment of all of the men at the head of those great labor organizations, and is the opinion of a great many of the manufacturers of the country. It is the opinion of almost every person who has given any thought to this question.

I also want to say that I believe Congress can do no greater service to the country than by seeing to it hereafter that the appropriations for the Department of Labor and the Division of Conciliation are sufficient for them to carry on their work.

Another thing I want to impress upon you is the importance of granting sufficient appropriations to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state in what measure or in what particular Congress has established its refusal to recognize the principle of collective bargaining?

Mr. CASEY. I do not say Congress, by action; I said the Members of Congress, preaching on the floor.

Mr. WALSH. So that was not directed at any legislative action?

Mr. CASEY. Oh, no. I clearly stated that—at least I so intended to.

Mr. WALSH. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. CASEY. I had in mind when I made the statement the Clayton Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. CASEY. In conclusion, I want to add that it is important also that sufficient appropriation be given to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, because that is the only bureau of the Government that works out the increase in living costs and the wages and working conditions in industry. It is the only responsible activity of the Government where the workers and the employers alike can go and get an unbiased and authentic statement as to the facts. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13870, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LANKFORD, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WINGO, for to-day, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. KETTNER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday, to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that is with the idea of the day being granted later?

Mr. MONDELL. My hope is that next week we may have disposed of the more pressing business to such an extent that it will make possible an additional day for Calendar Wednesday business.

Mr. ESCH. Possibly Thursday following Wednesday of next week?

Mr. MONDELL. That is my hope, and if not Thursday, a day very soon thereafter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m., in order to expedite the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not quite see how we are going to expedite the consideration of that measure. We have been meeting here for two or three days at 11 o'clock, and we have taken more time on this measure than ordinarily.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we are approaching the end of the session and gentlemen desire to address the House on a variety of subjects. It is important, I think, that they should be given that opportunity.

Mr. WALSH. I have heard a great many gentlemen say that we agree to meet at 11 o'clock before we adjourn; that they are obliged to be away and do not know anything about it, and come over here at the usual hour.

Mr. MONDELL. I should regret if anybody missed these speeches, but, of course, if one should, he might read them in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. I think it is very unwise to establish meeting at 11 o'clock for general debate when debate is not confined to the bill. I dislike very much to run counter to the request of the majority leader and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but unless there can be some more urgent reason given than that, I feel compelled to object.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that to-morrow morning, before we go into Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the bill, an agreement will be reached with regard to limiting debate. There are quite a number of Members who want to make some speeches at this time. I hope we will begin to read the bill before 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Now, there are some gentlemen who prepared speeches for some time, and they feel that this might be the last opportunity, and we have been quite liberal because of that, but the gentlemen should remember that this bill should be expedited as rapidly as possible so as to give the Senate some time for its consideration, and as soon as this bill is out of the way it will be necessary for the deficiency subcommittee to take up some deficiency estimates and hold hearings on them. I hope the gentleman will not interpose an objection at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not see why the gentleman from Massachusetts should object at this time, because this same little bunch of 8 or 10 men who are present now have stayed to close the House every evening, and will be here in the morning to open it, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. They have to do it every day, so why should the gentleman object at this time?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe if we dispense with meeting at 11 o'clock on one day during this general debate we are going to obstruct the passage of this measure, and I feel compelled to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 5, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we desire to perform our task in life upon the highest plane we are capable of. We seek to master the physical forces and make them our servants. We seek to enter the realm of truth, to know the relationship of things and power, and we seek above all the realm of the spirit, where we may adjust our lives to God, and complete our task by fulfilling the will of God. Help us to-day to live upon this plane. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when on request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

NEAR EAST RELIEF.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Near East Relief for the year ended December 31, 1919, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, to repeal section 18 of "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes," and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 795) to provide for the disposition of public lands withdrawn and improved under the provisions of the reclamation laws, and which are no longer needed in connection with said laws, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 13677) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems and to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BALL. I present a memorial from Augustus P. Gardner Post, No. 18, American Legion, of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the passage of a compensation or bonus bill carrying with it any classification. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the District of Columbia commander of the American Legion has sent to the Augustus P. Gardner Post, No. 18, of the District of Columbia, through usual channels, a copy of H. R. 13293, a bill to be known as the national soldiers land settlement, home aid, vocational training, and adjusted compensation act, together with the recommendation of the District of Columbia department legislative officer of the American Legion that all District of Columbia posts and their members urge Senators and Representatives individually to pass that bill at the earliest possible moment and without radical amendment; and

Whereas this is the first occasion upon which the Augustus P. Gardner Post has been called upon to cooperate or even to express its opinion in the matter of this proposed adjusted compensation; and

Whereas this fitting occasion has arisen for the post to take public notice and action on this vital question: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Augustus P. Gardner Post is opposed to the passage of the national soldiers land settlement, home aid, vocational training, and adjusted compensation (H. R. 13293) act because all of its provisions are based primarily upon a monetary gratuity for past military service. The bonus for past or prospective military service has been a recognized evil throughout our history. The payment of such a bonus would violate the principle of the fundamental obligation of the citizen to render military service to the State in time of war. That obligation has no price.

The bill would impose a financial burden on the country which would be economically disastrous and, in the exercise of their sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and Nation, the members of the Augustus P. Gardner Post can not approve, and do oppose, the imposition of such a burden. The American Legion was not formed to serve such purposes as this. Nor can the veteran justify a demand for a bonus by the misdeeds of the profiteer. He should neither protect nor imitate the wrongdoer; and be it further

Resolved, That the Augustus P. Gardner Post urges the speedy passage of all necessary legislation for the complete relief of injured veterans and the widows and orphans of those who died as the result of service. It believes that support of this bill by the American Legion would be in effect the abandonment by the American Legion of the disabled and the widows and orphans; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to all Members of Congress in order that they may be informed of the opposition to the bill by the Augustus P. Gardner Post and its reasons therefor, to the national commander of the American Legion, to the commanders of the departments of the American Legion, and to all posts thereof in the District of Columbia in the hope that the reasons expressed against the bonus may influence them to oppose this bill, and to the press in the hope that it may induce due consideration of the reasons against the bonus and influence others to take similar action.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of sundry post-office employees of Pawtucket, R. I., and a petition of the Post Office Supervisors' Association, of Providence, R. I., praying for an immediate report by the Postal Salaries Commission relative to granting increased salaries to postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

JEFFERSON NATIONAL FOREST.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3210) for the consolidation of lands within the Jefferson National Forest, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 575) thereon.

ANNIVERSARY OF LANDING OF PILGRIM FATHERS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. From the Committee on the Library I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 302) authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass.

The House report is adopted as the report of the Senate committee. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to say in reference to this report that I was on the commission appointed by the two Houses to look into the question of the anniversary celebration of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. The commission reported an appropriation to carry out the plans that have been perfected by the State of Massachusetts and the others that are interested in the celebration, and they agreed to apply one dollar of Government money for each dollar that was appropriated by the State of Massachusetts. In fact, I think the State has made a larger appropriation than is carried in this report. However, it is a great event. Congress has always recognized the happening of celebrated events, and I think the proposal of the committee is very proper and the joint resolution should be passed.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission) and to be composed of 11 commissioners as follows: Three persons to be appointed by the President of the United States; four Senators by the President of the Senate; and four Members of the House of Representatives by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commissioners shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number.

SEC. 2. (a) That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $400,000, to be expended by the commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

(b) One hundred thousand dollars of such appropriation may be expended under the direction of the commission and in cooperation with the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission, the town of Provincetown, Mass., and such other agencies, public or private, as the commission may determine, for the purpose of completing and improving the approaches to and the grounds of the Pilgrim Monument at Provincetown, Mass.; of erecting suitably inscribed tablets or markers in the towns of Provincetown, Truro, Wellfleet, and Eastham, and for other work in connection therewith, in accordance with plans adopted by the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission.

(c) Three hundred thousand dollars of such appropriation may be expended under the direction of the commission and in cooperation with the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, the town of Plymouth, Mass., and such other agencies, public or private, as the commission may determine, for the purpose of restoring and improving Plymouth Rock and the shore line of the locality adjacent thereto, of protecting and improving the burial grounds upon Coles Hill and Burial Hill in Plymouth, Mass.; of erecting tablets or markers at appropriate places in the Old Colony, and for other work in connection therewith, in accordance with plans adopted by the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission.

SEC. 3. That no expenditure shall be made or authorized by the commission until the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has, as determined by the commission, expended or contracted to expend the sum of $300,000 for the same purposes for which the commission may under the provisions of this resolution make expenditures. The United States shall not be held liable for any cost, expense, obligation, or indebtedness on account of the maintenance or upkeep of any property in respect to which any expenditure is made by the commission under the provisions of this resolution, nor for any obligation or indebtedness incurred by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission, the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, or any other agency or officer, employee, or agent thereof, for any purpose for which the commission may under the provisions of this resolution make expenditures. All expenditures of the commission shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission, but no expenditure shall be made or authorized by the commission except with the approval of a majority of the commissioners.

SEC. 4. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to issue a special series of postage stamps, in such denominations and of such design as he may determine, commemorative of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of sections 1, 2, and 4 of this resolution shall expire December 31, 1921.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 4331) for the relief of Robert F. Caudill; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 4332) to exchange the present Federal building and site at Gastonia, N. C., for a new site and building (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4333) for the relief of Moore L. Henry; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 4334) granting an increase of pension to Jesse R. Oastler; to the Committee on Pensions.

SALMON FISHERIES IN ALASKA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to prohibit for the purpose of canning and export from Alaska fishing of salmon in the Yukon River, Alaska, its tributaries, and adjacent waters. With the general purpose of the bill and what is to be accomplished by it I am in hearty accord, but I do not know enough about its provisions to say that I am in favor of the bill as it is. I introduce it that there may be an opportunity to be heard before the committee. Such bills I think should properly go to the Committee on Fisheries. This bill relates, however, solely to fisheries in Alaska, to the local situation in Alaska, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (S. 4330) to prohibit for the purpose of canning and export from Alaska fishing of salmon in the Yukon River, Alaska, its tributaries, and adjacent waters was read twice by title and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMENDMENT TO THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment relative to the purchase of 5,000 acres of land for a target range at Leon Springs Military Reservation, Tex., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

INTEREST RATES AND LIBERTY BONDS.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, on Friday last the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] had inserted in the RECORD a letter which he had addressed to the Federal Reserve Board urging that it take steps to bring Liberty bonds back to par. I have here a copy of the reply of the board to this letter, signed by its governor, Mr. Harding, and I think it eminently proper that it should have a place in the RECORD. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 3, 1920.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Federal Reserve Board has given careful attention to your letter of April 27, in which you ask the board "to consider the injurious effects of raising the interest rates in America in its relation to bearing down the market value of Government bonds."

You refer to the case of an important national bank which has on hand an amount of Liberty bonds entirely out of proportion to its capital and surplus. The board has full knowledge of the specific case to which you refer, and has in its files copies of correspondence dating back for more than a year between the member bank and the Federal reserve bank with which these bonds are pledged as collateral.

You do not appear to have been correctly or fully advised as to the facts. You state that the president of this bank has explained to you that his bank "had bought and underwritten a much larger volume of Government bonds than they would have done normally because of important Government works put up in his city. Thousands of employees who were compelled to buy Government bonds * * * unloaded them on the bank when the war suddenly ended," and that the bank "has been unable to sell these bonds on a falling market, and the market is falling because the reserve board has raised the rate of interest."

The board has no information, nor does it believe that employees at Government works anywhere were ever compelled to buy Liberty bonds, and it does not believe that in this instance the employees who had subscribed for bonds "unloaded" them on the bank. The board's information is that when this particular plant was shut down after the signing of the armistice many employees had subscribed for bonds for which they had not finished paying, and the bank referred to in your letter, through an affiliated institution, assumed these subscriptions for the original subscribers on terms which resulted in a considerable loss to the subscribers and a corresponding potential profit to the bank. The bank in question did not pursue the policy which was adopted by many others of selling at the market Liberty bonds which it could not place with investors, large or small, in its community, but seemed to prefer to hold the bonds.

Although up to May 1, 1919, the discount rate on member banks' notes secured by Liberty bonds was 4 per cent at eight of the Federal reserve banks—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Atlanta, St. Louis, Minneapolis, and Dallas—and was 4½ per cent at the other Federal reserve banks, the market quotations on Liberty bonds had steadily declined, so that the average price during the month of April, 1919, of the various issues was as follows:

First convertible 4	95.27
First convertible 4¼	95.43
Second 4	93.61
Second convertible 4¼	93.64
Third 4¼	95.43
Fourth 4¼	93.61

Up to November, 1919, these discount rates at the Federal reserve banks remained the same, except that Dallas had advanced its rate on member banks' collateral notes, secured by Liberties, from 4 per cent to 4½ per cent, and it was not until about the middle of November, 1919, that rates on this class of paper at 10 of the banks were advanced to 4½ per cent and at 2—Cleveland and Kansas City—were advanced to 4¾ per cent.

Notwithstanding the fact, however, that for a period of 12 months after the fourth Liberty loan member banks in most of the districts could rediscount paper secured by Liberty bonds at rates lower than the coupon rate, and in the other four or five districts at the coupon rate, the bonds had declined to an average of about 94. This completely disproves your contention that the Liberty bond market fell because the Federal Reserve Board raised the rate of interest.

Reverting to the bank referred to in your letter, although this institution had on hand unsold in April, 1919, Liberty bonds amounting to more than two and a half times its combined capital and surplus, and to more than 25 per cent of its deposits, and although it was indebted to its Federal reserve bank at that time, it more than doubled its holdings of Liberty bonds in April and May, 1919, by purchases in the open market, the admitted object being to average down the cost of bonds already held. This was done in the face of the Victory loan campaign, and it is interesting to note that the bank's subscriptions to Victory notes in May, 1919, amounted to just one-third of its open market purchases of Liberty bonds in April and May, 1919. The Victory notes were bought at par while the open-market purchases of Liberty bonds were made around 94. The bank now has no Victory notes on hand, having sold all it subscribed for.

The Federal reserve bank has not been insisting that this bank sell its bonds at a loss, but has been insisting that it adjust its affairs so as to lean less heavily upon the Federal reserve bank.

A glance at the discount rates of all Federal reserve banks during the year 1919 and a study of market quotations for Liberty bonds during the year ought to convince anyone that the decline in the market price for Liberty bonds and Victory notes has resulted from circumstances entirely beyond the control of the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve banks.

In an address made on Friday last before the Academy of Political Science in New York, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Leffingwell, in referring to predictions made a year ago that Victory notes would shortly go to a premium and that Liberty bonds would be selling at or near par within a year or two, said:

> Everyone knows why these sanguine expectations have not been realized. With the armistice, and still more after the Victory loan, our people underwent a great reaction. Those who had bought Liberty bonds as a matter of patriotism, but not as investors, began to treat their bonds as so much spending money. Those who had obeyed the injunction to borrow and buy Liberty bonds ignored the complementary injunction to save and pay for them. A $50 bond in the hands of a patriot turned spendthrift was to him a $50 bill to be spent Saturday night; or, to her, a new hat, and if the $50 bill turned out to be a $45 bill, small matter. This was the first and most immediate cause of the depreciation of Liberty bonds, affecting them particularly.

There are about $22,000,000,000 of Liberty bonds and Victory notes outstanding. They can not be brought back to par by artificial methods. Experience has shown that they could not be held at par last year by Federal reserve discount rates below their coupon rate, and it would be very unwise in the present circumstances to establish a discount rate on paper secured by these obligations much below the current rates for money.

There is a world-wide demand for capital, and the demand for bank credit in this country for agricultural, commercial, and industrial purposes is heavier than has ever been known before; investment demands for new construction, for the maintenance and equipment of railroads, and for the financing of our foreign trade are very great. In the face of all these demands should the Federal reserve banks have continued to offer a low discount rate on paper secured by Government obligations—a rate far below the current rates for money—they would have been overwhelmed with applications for loans on these securities and the volume would probably have been so great as to have far exceeded their utmost lending power.

While the Federal Reserve Board is authorized and empowered by paragraph (c) of section 11 of the Federal reserve act, under certain conditions, to suspend the reserve requirements specified in the act, it believes that this power is granted it for emergency purposes and that it is not the intent of the act that the Federal reserve banks be permitted to operate as a general rule with reserves below the legal minimum. The board therefore has taken and must continue to take such steps as in its judgment may be necessary to enable the Federal reserve banks to function normally with reserves not below the minimum required by section 16 of the Federal reserve act. In view of the provisions in that section for the redemption of Federal reserve notes outstanding, it is important that these reserves be maintained.

Ordinarily in the early months of the year there is liquidation, and discount rates work to a lower basis. There has been no let-up, however, in demands upon banks for credit during the present year; the total of discounted and purchased bills held by all Federal reserve banks on December 26, 1919, amounted to $2,780,090,000; on April 27 the total was $2,888,748,000. While some may argue from this that the advance in discount rates made by the Federal reserve banks on January 23 has not been effective, the board is firmly of the opinion that had these advances not been made the demands upon the Federal reserve banks would have been much heavier than they have been and that the banks would by this time have all been below their legal reserve.

During the year 1919 the board tested the policy of attempting to control the credit situation by admonitions and warnings without raising rates. While convinced that it is necessary for the Federal reserve banks to pay the closest attention to the discount policies of member banks, and particularly to those which are large borrowers, and that it is their duty to impress upon the member banks the necessity for the exercise of a discriminating judgment in granting credits, the board feels that the application of a rate is a vital factor in credit control, and it notes with interest your view as expressed in the course of your remarks in the Senate on Friday, April 30, that "when aggressive borrowing banks ask in excess of their own reserves the Federal reserve bank is justified in imposing a rate that will penalize those banks, thus automatically checking the abuse * * *."

While you do not say so in direct terms, your letter intimates that the Federal Reserve Board should adjust its discount rates with the view of sustaining the market value of Government bonds, but paragraph (d) of section 14 of the Federal reserve act provides that rates of discount to be charged by the Federal reserve banks "shall be fixed with a view of accommodating commerce and business." Were rates reduced with a view of bringing Government bonds back to par, it is the board's belief that the desired result would not be attained, while the demand upon the Federal reserve banks would be so great that they would have left no resources available for the accommodation of commerce and business. As a matter of fact, the policy of the Federal Reserve Board to curb inflation will in the long run result in improving the market value of Liberty bonds and a contrary policy of furnishing credit at cheap rates at a time like this would impair the market. The value of a promise to pay a sum certain at a future date is impaired by the inflation which the board is trying to control.

In the concluding paragraph of your letter you call attention to the "unpardonable and scandalous practice of usurious charges current in New York City" on call loans; "the rates have been running as high as 30 per cent," and enter your protest against this, and call upon the Federal Reserve Board to "put an end to this nefarious practice."

On March 8, 1920, upon your motion, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be, and is hereby, directed to advise the Senate what is the cause and justification for the usurious rates of interest on collateral call loans in the financial centers, under what law authorized, and what steps, if any, are required to abate this condition.

On March 27, 1920, the board sent a letter to the Senate giving the information required by the resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed. The board infers from the reference you make in your letter to the interest rates on call loans that this reply has not been brought to your attention, and therefore incloses a copy of Senate Document No. 262, which contains the information the board has been able to gather on the subject.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Hon. R. L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HARRIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The morning business is closed.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, for the purpose of condensing my observations to a period of time that I fancy is somewhat more reasonable and usually more acceptable, I ask now, instead of stopping at various points in the presentation of my argument, to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a number of authorities which I quote, a number of quotations from the early fathers, and other quotations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KNOX. I crave the indulgence of my associates in the Senate and ask their permission to present consecutively the observations I have prepared, assuring them that I have endeavored to cover all the points, and that in most cases perhaps they will find that matters which occur to them will be treated of in subsequent portions of my remarks.

Mr. President, our attention is once more turned to measures designed to bring peace to our country. More than 17 months ago the last shot in the Great War was fired. From that time until the present we in this country have been living subject to an unreasoning war-time rule which is unnecessary in practice, unknown in precedent, and anomalous in law.

The welfare and safety of the Nation imperatively demands that we know we have peace. The whole world seethes with revolution. Our own Nation is in ferment and turmoil. Force and strife are rampant and threaten the destruction not only of our property but of our free institutions and even of our very lives. And yet we stand, and have stood for months, as a rudderless ship foundering in the trough of tremendous seas. We must not dare longer to delay a return to the ordered government of peace; we must not hazard a further postponement in turning our undivided deliberations to our home problems. They are great enough, sir, to tax the utmost wisdom which we possess. As a preliminary step, the Executive must be returned to his peace-time powers and prerogatives. Need, propriety, wisdom, can not question this. The resolution before us is designed to bring us to this.

As I proceed in my remarks I shall be forced to make observations which I wish were not needful, to advert to certain conditions and situations which it were infinitely pleasanter to blink or ignore, for it is an unwelcome task to judge one who has fallen in the public esteem. But the time has come when we must speak plainly of facts as they exist, because this situation which confronts us can not otherwise be understood and met. But I assure you that in such judgments as I shall pass I shall proceed calmly and without bitterness, because I entertain only sympathy for the President in his illness and sympathy for the country which must suffer under him because of it. But, when danger threatens the Nation, it must be met forefronted; and he who ventures to intervene against the safe and wise course must step aside or be crushed. And so, sir, we must proceed now in the rescue of the people from their present unhappy state, leaving the weight of censure and responsibility for past errors and misadventures to fall where it may.

The course of the President ever since he cruised to Europe to participate in the peace conference leaves no chance for doubt that he will continue, hereafter as heretofore, to thwart, so far as he is able, every attempt on the part of the Senate, the Congress, or the people, to take any action immediately or remotely affecting in however slight a degree, through change or modification, the provisions of the treaty of Versailles as it came to us fresh from his signature. He has preferred to keep the country in an alleged state of war for now almost a year rather than abate one jot or tittle of the full measure his isolated will had set for the Nation. Constitutional order, lawful functions, rights and duties of position, oaths of office as affecting the Members of this body, he has noticed only to bring into contempt. He has conjured up every power within the whole vast executive domain in his efforts to compel this Senate to surrender its will and judgment to him, to become mere automatons to register his mandate—to approve this treaty in its last minutiæ of detail as he sent it to us. In saying all this I am not, sir, permitting myself to exaggerate; I am not allowing myself the license of fervid discourse; I am merely recording the simple truth generally admitted by even his friends.

Now, in the face of this situation it will be idle for us to pass any resolution looking to the immediate establishment of peace that does not contemplate the unqualified acceptance of the treaty, if that resolution requires from the President the performance of any act or duty, in order to secure peace, because if we do he will, if the statements of his representatives are accepted, so delay or ignore that act or duty as to defeat the end and purpose of our action, for in his opinion wisdom lies only in following the behests of his will. Therefore, if the resolution is to be effective, it must be self-operative. Nothing necessary to the bringing of peace must be left for his accomplishment. I say this in the belief that what we all seek is an actual recognized peace, a resumption of our peace-time avocations under normal peace-time conditions, and that we are seeking it, not for the mere partisan advantage of certainly shifting the burden of responsibility for any failure to have peace, but because we honestly believe that peace is indispensable to the salvation of this great Government and people. For this reason our proposed resolution must stand so that in all of its essentials looking toward peace it will be operative without any Executive action. This is the first and most fundamental requisite of any resolution which we shall pass.

But in order to determine accurately whether the resolution offered will meet this requirement and will so establish peace-time ordered government in this country we must carefully consider two factors: First, the international situation now existing, together with the rules and principles controlling it; and, second, the present domestic situation and the constitutional principles therein involved.

I shall devote myself, in the first instance, to these two latter matters, in their order, that I may lay a proper basis for the relatively short necessary discussion of the resolution itself.

In this discussion it is necessary, as pointed out in the majority report upon the House resolution, to recall that wars may be terminated in one of three ways: First, through the abstention by both parties from further acts of war, or, as one writer puts it, "War may silently cease and peace be silently renewed" (III Phillimore, 772; II Oppenheim, 323); or, second, war may be ended by the establishment of peace "through a special treaty of peace"; or, third, one of the belligerents may completely subjugate his adversary.

We shall in the present discussion be primarily concerned with the first and second of these.

Among the instances most commonly named by international authorities of the ending of war by the cessation of hostilities are the war between Sweden and Poland, where hostilities terminated in 1716 (III Phillimore, 772), no formal treaty between the two kingdoms being concluded for a period of 10 years (II Oppenheim, 323); the war between Spain and France so ending in 1720; between Russia and Persia, ending in 1801; and between France and Mexico, ending in 1867. To this may be added the war between Spain and the allied South American States in the late sixties. Actual hostilities by the belligerents having ceased in May, 1866, Mr. Seward in 1868 instructed our representative in Spain to say that—

> The technical continuance of the status of war between Spain on the one part, and Peru, Chile, Ecuador, and Bolivia on the other, occasions inconvenience to all neutral States, and especially to this country, which it is desirable should be terminated by a formal armistice. (Foreign Relations, 1868, pt. 1, p. 6.)

Late in the summer Mr. Seward again offered the friendly offices of this Government toward a settlement of the difficulty. In the course of the discussion which followed between the two nations the Spanish minister took the position that "The state of war between the nations exists so long as the belligerent and interested parties do not stipulate for peace." (Foreign Relations, 1868, pt. 2, p. 32.)

In reply to this contention Mr. Seward pointed out—

> That the Peruvian Government on its part insists that the situation of war between herself and allies on the one part and Spain on the other has practically come to an end by the cessation of all hostilities on either side since the 2d day of May, 1866. (Id., p. 33.)

And then set out that Spain and Chile (as Peru alleged)— > have, in the present year, voluntarily joined themselves together in peaceful and friendly concert and cooperation in waiving objection to the clearance from British ports of ships of war for the respective parties.

Mr. Seward later added:

> It seems to the President that the occasion has not yet arrived when it will be necessary for him to decide the grave question which has been raised before this Government between the ministers of Spain and Peru, namely, the question whether the war which was heretofore waged between those nations has been practically brought to an end or not. Frankness, however, obliges the undersigned to say that unless some unforeseen circumstances shall soon occur, the time for acting upon that question would seem to be near at hand. (Id., p. 33.)

> It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances.

Thus our own Government is committed to the principle that war may come to an end by the silent cessation of hostilities.

There is no need to discuss at this point the closing of a war by a formal treaty, this being the normal method of concluding hostilities between nations and so well in the minds of all of us.

As the conditions under which we entered the war are useful to a proper understanding of the international situation as it exists to-day, I shall presume to recall the main events.

What the President finally came to recognize as a "war against all nations" (address to Congress, Apr. 2, 1917) broke by the declaration of war between Austria-Hungary and Serbia on July 28, 1914. Between that date and August 18, 1918, the war had extended to involve Germany, France, Belgium, Great Britain, Russia, and Montenegro (Carnegie peace endowment pamphlet No. 3, 1914. Signatures, etc., Hague conventions).

On August 18, 1914, the President issued his famous neutrality of feeling proclamation, in which he exhorted his fellow countrymen as follows:

> The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action, must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another.
> My thought is of America. I am speaking, I feel sure, the earnest wish and purpose of every thoughtful American that this great country of ours, which is, of course, the first in our thoughts and in our hearts, should show herself in this time of peculiar trial a Nation fit beyond others to exhibit the fine poise of undisturbed judgment, the dignity of self-control, the efficiency of dispassionate action; a Nation that neither sits in judgment upon others nor is disturbed in her own counsels, and which keeps herself fit and free to do what is honest and disinterested and truly serviceable for the peace of the world. (State Department White Book No. 2, p. 71.)

In February of the following year, following the announcement by the German Government that the waters surrounding Great Britain and Ireland were to be considered as within the seat of war, the President, calling attention to the dangers which any such action would have for American commerce, announced that—

> The Government of the United States would be constrained to hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability for such acts of their naval authorities and to take any steps it might be necessary to take to safeguard American lives and property and to secure to American citizens the full enjoyment of their acknowledged rights on the high seas. (State Department White Book No. 1, p. 54.)

Less than two months from the dispatch of that appropriate warning a German submarine, after brazen notification of the intention so to do, sank the British steamship Lusitania off the coast of Ireland. More than 100 American citizens, including women and children, lost their lives.

Three days later, on May 10, in an address at Independence Hall—of all places in the world—in Philadelphia, the President, addressing a body of naturalized American citizens, after speaking of love and sympathy and justice, "the touch and ideal of America," the consciousness of America—a consciousness which, I may remark in passing, the terrible sinking of the Lusitania had unified and solidified far more than the happening of any other single event during the whole war—said:

The example of America must be a special example. The example of America must be the example not merely of peace because it will not fight, but of peace because peace is the healing and elevating influence of the world and strife is not. There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight. There is such a thing as a nation being so right that it does not need to convince others by force that it is right. (Hart's Selected Wilson Addresses, p. 88.)

Three days later than this, and following a storm of protest that rocked the whole country to its foundations, the President, addressing the German Government regarding the sinking of the Lusitania, again bluffed and blustered about "strict accountability," and closed with the observation:

The Imperial German Government will not expect the Government of the United States to omit any word or any act necessary to the performance of its sacred duty of maintaining the rights of the United States and its citizens and of safeguarding their free exercise and enjoyment. (State Department White Book No. 1, p. 77.)

The war dragged on its weary way through the balance of 1915 and the year 1916. Outrage followed outrage in quick succession. We wrote and fumed but took no action. The pen was to be mightier than the sword. In December, 1916, the President made overtures to the belligerent governments looking to the establishment of peace, but nothing came of it. In January, 1917, just before he received confirmatory notice of what apparently Ambassador Gerard had told him of months before, namely, that Germany intended to renew unrestricted submarine warfare—and just after his peace move had failed—the President delivered his famous "peace without victory" speech in which he said that since statesmen on both sides of the controversy declared "it was no part of the purpose they had in mind to crush their antagonists" (V Times History, p. 964) certain implications arose from such assurances. He said:

They imply, first of all, that it must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. I beg that I may be permitted to put my own interpretation upon it and that it may be understood that no other interpretation was in my thought. I am seeking only to face realities and to face them without soft concealments. Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently, but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance. (Hart's Selected Wilson Addresses, p. 175.)

Two days later Andrew Bonar Law, chancellor of the exchequer, replying to this speech of President Wilson's, made this observation:

Our aims are the same as President Wilson's. What he is longing for we are fighting for, our sons and brothers are risking their lives for, and we mean to secure it. (V Times, 1096.)

A little over two months after we were to have "peace without victory," we having in the meanwhile broken off diplomatic relations with Germany, the President appeared before Congress, which he had convened in extraordinary session. He now, fired with the zeal of a new-dawned idea, declared that—

The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

"It is a war against all nations," and he advised "that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States, that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war." (Hart's Addresses, p. 191.)

As he continued his address the President enlarged considerably upon his views of the personality and character of our enemy. While I have already in my remarks of August 29 last called these particularly to the attention of the Senate, I desire now to repeat them because when taken in connection with our declaration of war they have a great and direct bearing upon the existing international status.

The President said:

We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering the war. It was not with their previous knowledge and approval.

Still further on, asserting that Prussian autocracy—has filled our unsuspecting communities and even our offices of Government with spies and set criminal intrigues everywhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries, and our commerce—

He said:

We knew that their source lay, not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people toward us (who were no doubt as ignorant of them as we ourselves were), but only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing.

Again, still later—

We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy.

And finally he said:

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity toward a people or with desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible Government which has thrown aside all consideration of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us.

Or, to put it shortly, our purposes as stated by the President were threefold: First, the defeat and elimination of the Imperial German Government and Prussian autocracy; next, the liberation from their yoke of despotism of the German people themselves—for whom we had nothing but sympathy and friendship—to the end that they might be masters of their own fates and fortunes; and lastly, the reestablishment, as sincere friends of the German people, of intimate relations of mutual advantage between them and us.

Following that address and after due discussion Congress passed the joint resolution which created a status of war between the United States and Germany. That resolution reads:

Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination, all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

In so far as my information goes, the German Government never declared war against the United States. They merely accepted the status which this declaration recognized and probably created; for it must be remembered that while we interpreted, and rightly so, that German submarine warfare as directed against the United States was illegal, constituting acts of war, the German Government never acquiesced in that view and, on the contrary, maintained the legality of all general measures taken.

Thus by Executive pronouncement, and by formal declaration by Congress, to whom is intrusted the sole right and duty to declare war, the hostilities which were recognized as existing, and the war to prosecute which all our national resources were pledged, was directed against the Imperial German Government, not against Germany nor, in terms, against the German people. It was the Imperial German Government, and not Germany or the German people, which was declared to have "committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States."

While, as I stated in my address of August 29 to this body, Congress did not move quite so sure-footedly regarding the noninvolvement of the German people in this war, yet we realized that the real war had to be primarily against the Imperial German Government, which we considered had debauched a great people, many of whose kin were among our best, most stalwart, and freedom-loving patriotic citizens.

Thus we embarked upon the war. It is not necessary for our purpose now to follow the course of the war either as to military operations or as to legislation enacted. But largely as a result of our entry into the war the German forces had by November, 1918, been forced into a position where they faced overwhelming disaster. They opened negotiations with the result that on November 11, 1918, a so-called armistice was signed between the German Government and the allied and associated powers, the latter being represented by Marshal

Foch, the supreme allied commander, who in signing the armistice acted for and in behalf of the President as Commander in Chief of the American forces just as much as he acted for the French or the British or the Italian Governments.

The signing of this armistice was announced to the people of the United States in the following presidential proclamation:

My fellow countrymen, the armistice was signed this morning. Everything for which America fought has been accomplished. It will now be our fortunate duty to assist by example, by sober, friendly counsel, and by material aid in the establishment of just democracy throughout the world. (IX Times Current History, pt. 1, p. 362.)

On the same date the President delivered a message to Congress in which, after reading the full terms of the armistice, he said:

The war thus comes to an end; for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it. (Id., p. 363.)

A little further he said:

We know only that this tragical war * * * is at an end—

And added—

We know, too, that the object of the war is attained; * * * The arbitrary power of the military caste of Germany, which once could secretly and of its own single choice disturb the peace of the world, is discredited and destroyed.

It is necessary at this point to consider the nature of an armistice, for this matter has an important bearing upon our further discussion and the conclusions we shall reach.

In common international parlance an armistice is practically the same as truce. Indeed, Holland is quoted as saying:

There is no difference of meaning, according to British usage at least, between a "truce," an "armistice," and a "suspension of arms." (2 Oppenheim, p. 290.)

Other writers, however, speak of and distinguish three sorts of armistices, namely, suspension of arms, general armistices, and partial armistices. (Id.)

Our own practice seems to place suspension of arms in one category and truces or armistices in another category, the two latter terms being used seemingly interchangeably. (VII Moore, 723 et seq.)

The Hague conventions, both of 1899 and 1907, speak of "flags of truce," "capitulations," and "armistices." The latter is defined thus:

An armistice suspends military operations by mutual agreement between the belligerent parties. If its duration is not defined, the belligerent parties may resume operations at any time, provided always that the enemy is warned within the time agreed upon in accordance with the terms of the armistice. (Laws and Customs of War on Land.)

Another article provides:

An armistice may be general or local. The first suspends the military operations of the belligerent States everywhere, the second only between certain factions of the belligerent armies and within a fixed radius. (Hague Conventions, Carnegie print, p. 121.)

But in order adequately to appraise the legal value of the so-called armistice which we signed with the enemy, we must have in mind the nature of a capitulation, which is defined by Halleck as follows:

Capitulations are agreements entered into by a commanding officer for the surrender of his army, or by the governor of a town, or a fortress, or particular district of country to surrender it into the hands of the enemy. Capitulations usually contain stipulations with respect to the inhabitants of the place which is surrendered, the security of their religion, property, privileges, and franchises, and also with respect to the troops or garrison, either allowing them to march out with arms and baggage, with the honors of war, or requiring them to lay down their arms and surrender as prisoners of war. (II Baker's Halleck, p. 354.)

In view of these definitions, I submit that an examination of our armistice will show it is an armistice in name only; that in reality it is a surrender, a capitulation by a nation defeated beyond all hope of immediate recuperation. As indicating how fully this is true, I wish briefly to recount to you the terms of this instrument.

In the first place it provided for the complete and absolute cessation of hostilities on land and sea and in the air on all fronts. It provided for the evacuation by German troops of all territory held by them outside the limits of Germany as it existed at the outbreak of the war, the Allies to have free access to all territories evacuated. It provided further for the evacuation of all German territory west of the Rhine, for the occupation thereof by the allied forces, who should also occupy the three great strategic cities on the Rhine, Mayence, Coblenz, and Cologne, together with the bridgeheads at these points. A neutral zone was created 10 kilometers wide along the right bank of the Rhine. The nationals of territories occupied by German forces were to be immediately repatriated. All allied prisoners were to be immediately released without reciprocity. Large quantities of military equipment and materials were to be surrendered, and that you may have an appreciation of what this meant I recall to you that it included 5,000 guns—2,500 heavy and an equal number of field—25,000 machine guns, 3,000 minewerfers, and 1,700 airplanes. Roads and means of communication of every kind, railroads, waterways, main roads, bridges, telegraphs, telephones of the territory evacuated were to remain unimpaired. Material and equipment were to be left in situ as also all military stores of coal and material for the upkeep of permanent ways, signals, and repair shops. The Germans were to give up 5,000 locomotives, 150,000 wagons, all with necessary spare parts and fittings, and 5,000 motor lorries.

The treaties and supplementary treaties of Bucharest and Brest-Litovsk were to be renounced. The great principle of reparation, which forms so conspicuous a feature in the treaty of Versailles, was laid down; Germany was to answer for all damage done; restitution was to be made of properties taken.

In addition to the immediate cessation of naval hostilities Germany was to give and did give definite information as to the location and movements of German ships; to notify neutrals of freedom of navigation in all German territorial waters for the naval and mercantile vessels of the allied and associated powers. All questions of neutrality were to be waived. Naval and mercantile marine prisoners of the allied and associated powers in German hands were to be returned without reciprocity. All submarines with their complete armament and equipment then existing were to surrender in ports specified by the Allies and the United States. Submarines which could not take the sea were to be disarmed and remain under the supervision of the Allies or the United States. Surface warships were to be immediately disarmed and interned in neutral or allied ports, to wit: Six battle cruisers, 10 battleships, 8 light cruisers (including 2 mine layers), 50 destroyers of the most modern type. It was under this provision that the great German fleet which had been held in German ports during practically the whole war was ordered into Scapa Flow. All other surface warships were to be concentrated at the German naval bases and to be completely disarmed. The German Government was to designate all mine fields and obstructions. Freedom of access to and from the Baltic was to be given, and to secure this all German forts, fortifications, batteries, and defense works of all kinds in all the entrances from the Cattegat into the Baltic were to be occupied by the Allies and the United States. The existing blockade conditions were to remain unchanged against Germany, whose merchant ships found at sea were to remain liable to capture. All naval aircraft was to be concentrated and immobilized in German bases. In evacuating the Belgian coast and ports all port and river navigation material, all merchant ships, tugs, lighters, all naval aeronautic apparatus, materials, and supplies, and all arms, apparatus, and supplies of every kind were to be abandoned by Germany. Black Sea ports were to be evacuated. Russian war vessels of all descriptions seized by Germany were to be handed over. Neutral merchant vessels were to be released. Merchant vessels belonging to the allied and associated powers were to be restored. There was to be no destruction of ships or materials before evacuation. Neutral countries, particularly Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, were to be notified that Germany canceled all restrictions placed on the trading of their vessels with the allied and associated countries, and, finally, no transfer of German merchant shipping of any description to any neutral flag was to take place after the signing of the armistice.

These provisions are among the more important of those that were included in this so-called armistice. Do they, sir, look to a mere truce such as obtains between armies when they wish to bury their dead? Do they look to mere temporary suspension of arms to meet some passing necessity of the belligerents? Or do they constitute a practical capitulation of the enemy through his surrendering his position, his stores, his munitions, and his arms, through his releasing all his prisoners, his surrendering his entire navy with its personnel, his promising reparation for all damage done during the war, by his admitting in every line his defeat, and by his practically guaranteeing under compelling sanctions his intention to cease all hostilities?

It is true this "armistice" was fixed for a period of 30 days and that it might be denounced by one of the parties upon proper notice. But no one can read the document and not understand that this provision as to the resumption of hostilities was inserted with the idea not that Germany could resume hostilities but that in case she unduly delayed or undertook to repudiate any of the terms of this armistice that then the allied armies should be at liberty to resume active hostilities and compel the observance of the terms.

Surely this document was an armistice only by courtesy and in name only; it was as a matter of fact a surrender and an admission of defeat by the German forces and the German Government. It was so understood at the time not only by the allied and associated powers but by the German Government and the German people. There was no thought in the mind of anyone that Germany could again effectively resume hostilities or would dare to try.

As the President had said to the German Government in his note of October 23, 1918, which immediately preceded the negotiations for the armistice:

The only armistice he would feel justified in submitting for consideration would be one which should leave the United States and the powers associated with her in a position to enforce any arrangements that may be entered into and to make a renewal of hostilities on the part of Germany impossible. (IX Times History, pt. 1, p. 370.)

And Marshal Foch said, replying to an inquiry as to whether the armistice had not been accorded to the German Government too soon:

It was difficult to ask more. Doubtless any general would have preferred to continue the struggle and give battle when battle offered itself so promisingly, but a father of a family could not fail to think of the blood that would be shed. A victory, however easy, costs the lives of men. We held victory in our grasp, without any further sacrifice. We took it as it came. The German high command was not ignorant of the fact that it faced colossal disaster. When it surrendered, everything was prepared for an offensive in which it would infallibly have succumbed. On November 14 we were to attack in Lorraine with 20 French divisions and 6 American divisions. This attack would have been supported by other movements in Flanders and in the center. The Germans were lost. They capitulated. There is the whole story. (IX Times Current History, p. 503.)

No one knows better than Marshal Foch the situation at the time the so-called armistice was signed. No one is better able to characterize the document which was signed and the significance of its signature on the part of the Germans. Marshal Foch says Germany capitulated, and I challenge anyone to read the document and face the facts as they were and as they have since developed and deny that this is the fact. It is true that armies did not by this document become prisoners of war. It is true that they were permitted to retire under arms, but it is equally true, as I have already said, that Germany was brought to her knees, that she knew it, and that the "armistice" actually provided the broad bases upon which the final peace terms were afterwards built.

Thus as a matter of intention and as a matter of fact made good by events since happening this armistice was a capitulation, a surrender of Germany to the allied and associated powers, and in very truth it finally and conclusively ended the actual hostilities between the warring powers.

The President was, therefore, fully justified in the statements which he made that "the war is at an end," "the object of the war is attained," "armed imperialism is at an end," and "the arbitrary power of the military caste of Germany * * * is discredited and destroyed."

That everybody understood, including the entire administration forces, that the war was ended by the signing of the armistice is indicated by a few important facts, to which I direct your attention.

The operations of the selective-service system were immediately stopped where they stood. No more men were taken into the service of the United States. The making of the great contracts for war materials and equipment was discontinued. The shipment of troops and supplies to Europe was curtailed to the point of discontinuance. Certain troop contingents already on the sea were recalled and disembarked. The training camps throughout the country were emptied of the hundreds of thousands of young men who had been concentrated there preparatory to sending them across the ocean. Finally, we began to bring back, seemingly as rapidly as the situation permitted, our troops who had been sent to France. The war was over; everybody felt it, everybody knew it. There was, sir, no excuse whatsoever for greatly prolonging the domestic status of war beyond the signature of the armistice; and the only explanation for so doing is a deliberate aim to retain all those autocratic compulsory powers with which the Executive had been endowed for the prosecution of the war, in order that they might be used for other purposes.

But I pass from the practical ending of the war by armistice to the ending of the war because of the fact that the power against which we declared war no longer existed. Recall at this point the words of the President, when he requested Congress to declare war, that we had no quarrel or fight with the German people and that he wished war declared against the Imperial German Government; recall also that Congress, essentially of the same mind with the President on the fundamentals of this proposal, actually did declare war, not against Germany, not against the German people, not against the constituent German States, but against the Imperial German Government, which was solemnly affirmed to have committed acts of war against us, and that to prosecute this war to a successful termination all of the resources of the country were pledged; recall the whole spirit and feeling of the American people at that time which gave substance to this view of the hostilities into which we were then about to enter, and then with these in mind let us follow succeeding events.

In the President's note of October 23, 1918, the last but one signed by him preceding the opening of negotiations for the armistice, he concluded with the following paragraph:

If it (the Government of the United States) must deal with the military masters and the monarchical autocrats of Germany now, or if it is likely to have to deal with them later in regard to the international obligations of the German Empire, it must demand, not peace negotiations, but surrender. Nothing can be gained by leaving this essential thing unsaid. (IX Times, part 1, 370.)

Revolutionary disturbances and upheavals in Germany immediately followed this statement. (IX Times, pt. 1, 385 et seq. Id., pt. 2, p. 429 et seq.) At first they appeared to have been within the control of the old régime. In fact, on October 28 the Kaiser himself appears to have issued a decree authorizing certain reforms. But the matter rapidly passed beyond his control. The end of the first week in November saw a revolt in the navy; on November 9 Prince Max, to whom the reform decree had been issued, announced that the Kaiser had abdicated, the Crown Prince had renounced his rights to the throne, and had set up a regency with Deputy Ebert as imperial chancellor. (IX Times, pt. 2, p. 438.) The following Sunday saw a revolution in Berlin. By the end of the week following this not only had the Kaiser abdicated but a round dozen other German crowns had fallen. The revolution thus begun worked on. On November 28 the Kaiser, from his haven of refuge in Holland, issued a formal abdication. During the early weeks of 1919, a little more than a month after the formal abdication, elections were held for a proposed national assembly, which was to form a provisional government and adopt a draft constitution. It appears that the radical Bolshevists and the radical pan-Germans were in the minority in this assembly, the great bulk of whom seemed to have been delegates desirous of creating a great German democracy. Premier Ebert delivered the opening speech, which began with these words:

We have done forever with princes and nobles, by the grace of God.

Later he said:

Our enemies declare that they are fighting against militarism, but militarism has been dethroned. (Id., p. 432.)

I shall not follow these proceedings further. They are sufficient to show that as a matter of fact the Imperial German Government ceased to exist with the signing of the armistice itself; that from that time until the present Germany has been governed by some form of democracy, just what form is not clear nor is it important; and that within the last month an effort to rehabilitate imperialism in Germany resulted in quick and dismal failure.

Thus the Imperial German Government, against which we declared war, did cease to exist at the time of the signing of the armistice, leaving us from thence on without any titular enemy against which to wage a war unless we were warring with the German people, and we have clearly estopped ourselves to make such a contention.

Thus from this point of view also the armistice brought us not alone the end of hostilities but actual peace. There remained only the making of arrangements covering the ordinary peace-time intercourse.

That the President had constitutional authority thus to close hostilities I think there can be no question, because as Commander in Chief he can accept the surrender of the enemy on such terms as he sees fit.

From the moment in which hostilities did end there has been no real patriotic purpose served by continuing to consider the United States at war, in so far as her domestic affairs were concerned. Actual fighting over, the condition to meet which the war powers are given and for which Congress had exercised them was terminated. A wise statesmanship, an unselfish estimate of patriotic duty, required the President immediately to place this country domestically upon a basis of peace. Such, however, was not the course followed.

One week after the signing of the armistice it was announced that the President would sail for France immediately after the opening of the regular session of Congress "for the purpose of taking part in the discussion and settlement of the main features of the treaty of peace." (IX Times History, pt. 2, p. 1.) It was said he probably would not remain throughout the session, but that "his presence at the outset is necessary in order to obviate the manifest disadvantages of discussion by cable in determining the greater outlines of the final treaty, about which he must necessarily be consulted."

On December 4 the President left for Europe, where he remained, barring a short visit to the United States in late February and early March of 1919, until the treaty of Versailles was signed, on June 28, 1919.

I pause long enough to note that of all the negotiators of that extraordinary instrument he alone drew around himself the cloak of a truly regal description, "Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, acting," not as President of the United States by virtue of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States, but "acting in his own name and by his own proper authority."

This treaty so negotiated and signed by the President, as I have already had occasion to point out in my speech of August 29, specifically provided for the act which would "terminate the war." I will again call those provisions to your attention.

The last paragraph of the preamble of the treaty reads in this wise:

From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment, and subject to the provisions of this treaty, official relations with Germany and any of the German States will be resumed by the allied and associated powers.

Two of the final clauses of article 440, the last article of the treaty, read thusly:

A first procès verbal of the deposit of ratification will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, on the other hand.

From the date of this first procès verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty, this date—

That is to say, the date of the first procès verbal of the deposit of ratification—will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

In all other respects the treaty will enter into force for each power at the date of the deposit of its ratifications.

Now, as I pointed out in the remarks to which I have just referred, the treaty negotiators clearly contemplated provision for two conditions: First, that of the termination of hostilities; and, second, that of providing for the future peace-time relations of the two sets of belligerents, both in respect of territory and of indemnity, trade, and commerce. As I have before said, it was imperative that the war should terminate for all parties at the same time, otherwise the great powers whose consent was necessary in order to bring a termination of the war might have found themselves harassed by the military operations of lesser powers who for one petty reason or another desired to continue hostilities. Such a situation would have been undersirable from the standpoint not alone of interference with Germany's ability to resume normal, economic life—an absolute essential for the payment of the vast indemnity contemplated by the treaty—but also because it would have been impossible for any power to carry on war with Germany without using as a base of operations either France or Italy, both of whom are anxious for and are at peace with Germany, or the territory of Russia or the Balkan powers lying to the east whose delicate political equipoise would inevitably have been upset, possibly again involving the whole world in a great conflagration by any military operations on their soil. And I ignore in this connection the legal inhibitions which would have been involved with any such obvious violation of territorial sovereignty as I have indicated.

Accordingly, it was the intention to end this conflict, terminate this war, if and when Germany and three of the principal allied and associated powers should have ratified this treaty.

Finally, this first procès verbal referred to in the treaty was deposited in January last after a delay of a little more than six months from the signing of the treaty.

Thus by the terms of the treaty itself, which treaty is now with our consent and by virtue of our stipulation come, in that respect, into full force and effect, the war has terminated; and in this connection I venture to observe that if, as the minority report on the House resolution contends, the making of peace is an executive function, then the Executive has already acted. If it is not an executive function, then Congress may, as to appropriate matters, act in a manner to bring peace.

It has resulted, furthermore, from the deposit of ratifications as above outlined that Germany and the other powers concerned are observing and carrying out the terms of the treaty in full detail. So far as I am advised, committees and organizations provided for by the treaty have been organized and are functioning. The various measures of Germany's disarmament, demobilization, and evacuation of territory, of the holding of plebiscites, of the surrender of territory, of the adjustment of territorial rights are being carried out to the letter, save as they are modified by the mutual consent of the parties. The privileges and advantages stipulated in the treaty for nationals of the allied and associated powers in respect of trade, commerce, residence, business, and professions are being carried out and enjoyed by the nationals of all of the powers, including our own, save only where our own citizens are being injuriously curbed by the restrictions imposed by our own Government as the result of the contention of the Executive that a state of war continues between ourselves and Germany. There is everywhere, outside of the United States itself, with all of the great powers, including ourselves—save only Russia—peace from the recent conflict. The powers say it; the Germans say it.

Internationally, therefore, we are at peace. Our late allies and associates say we are at peace. Our erstwhile enemies say we are at peace. All are going forward on a peace-time basis under terms and conditions of a treaty negotiated by our associates and us and ratified by them and the enemy. Our National Executive with a stubborn irresponsibility continues to declare we are at war. But as a practical matter the only war which he wages is against American citizens and American industry. With Germany he wages no war. Not a single shot has been fired for more than 18 months. He cooperates in the measures of those who are at peace with Germany and who are conducting relations under a treaty of peace. The situation is so anomalous and so iniquitous, is so fraught with injustice and with possibility of disaster, that one can not reconcile it with the operations of sane statesmanship.

Being thus advised as to the international situation, we shall see more clearly the domestic condition with which we are confronted in respect of this war.

I shall consider this question from the standpoint of broad principle rather than that of judicial decision and dicta in cases where the matter we now consider was not under direct judicial scrutiny, because I feel that if and when the matter comes to the Supreme Court it will be considered from the broad view of judicial statesmanship as affected by fundamental principles and not from the narrow and contracted consideration of chance remarks or mere precedents.

In our consideration of the precise questions involved there are certain matters, helpful and explanatory, which we shall do well to carry in mind. In the first place, it will be useful to have in mind at the outset just what war is and what the founders of the Government understood it to be. One of the best and most logical writers of international law, Westlake, says:

War is the state of condition of governments contending by force. (2 Westlake, p. 1.)

Hall speaks of the matter as follows:

When differences between States reach a point at which both parties resort to force, or one of them does acts of violence which the other chooses to look upon as a breach of the peace, the relation of war is set up, in which the combatants may use regulated violence against each other until one of the two has been brought to accept such terms as his enemy is willing to grant. (Hall, 6th ed., p. 60.)

Oppenheim says:

In any case, it is universally recognized that war is a contention, which means a violent struggle through the application of armed force. For a war to be in existence, two or more States must actually have their armed forces fighting against each other, although the commencement of a war may date back to its declaration or some other unilateral initiative act. (2 Opp., p. 61.)

These are the definitions of war given by authorities on international law. I might continue them indefinitely, but they are practically all to the same purpose.

Without wearying you with long quotations to prove my statement, I will say that the framers of our Constitution regarded the term war as having this same meaning, as is shown by the debates in the Constitutional Convention and by the writings of Hamilton, Madison, and Jay in the Federalist, where, for example, "hostility among nations" is used as equivalent to war among nations, and where the sole thought and provision concerning war had to do with armies and navies, their raising, regulation, support, and their operations. (Federalist, Nos. VI, VII, LXXIV.)

I may pause long enough to remark that it was quite impossible that the men who framed our Government, who wrote our Constitution, should have had any other view than this, for of the 40 signers of that great instrument 20 saw actual service in the Revolutionary War, of whom 5 served, at one time or another, on Washington's staff. Of these same 20 who saw actual service 13 also served in the Continental Congress during portions of the war. Of the 20 signers who did not see actual service in the Army 15 saw service in the Continental Congress during the war. Thus but 5 of the 40 men who signed our fundamental instrument were without experience either in the field or in the legislative halls during a time of actual war, and among those who served in the field and who participated in the drafting of our fundamental instrument were Washington, Hamilton, Mifflin, McHenry, and Charles Cotesworth Pinckney; and among those who served only in the Continental Congress and who were cosigners of the Constitution were Franklin, the two Morrises, Wilson, Dickinson, Rutledge, Sherman, and Charles Pinckney.

The early decisions of the Supreme Court show it also considered that war meant hostilities.

Mr. Justice Washington, in the case of The Eliza (1800), said:

> Every contention by force between two nations in external matters, under the authority of their respective governments, is not only war but public war. (4 Dallas, 40.)

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in The Amelia (1801), discussing our possible war status with France, said:

> The whole powers of war, being by the Constitution of the United States vested in Congress, the acts of that body can alone be resorted to as our guides in this inquiry. It is not denied, nor in the course of the argument has it been denied, that Congress may authorize general hostilities, in which case the general laws of war apply to our situation; or partial hostilities, in which case the laws of war, so far as they actually apply to our situation, must be noticed. To determine the real situation of America in regard to France the acts of Congress are to be inspected. (1 Cranch, 28.)

No one knew better than the great Chief Justice what the waging of war meant, nor had anyone sounder ideas as to the seat in which was lodged the power to make war.

Our Federal practice has accorded with this. Francis Lieber, in his code issued during the Civil War as Instructions to Our Armies, which governed our military operations after their issuance, defines war thus:

> Public war is a state of armed hostility between sovereign nations or governments. (VII Moore, p. 154.)

Thus the essence of war, as defined by all the authorities, is armed conflict. There may be cases of the employment of armed force where war does not eventuate, for example, the entry and occupation of China by the armed forces of the powers during the Boxer uprising in China in 1900. But there is no case, I believe, where any war has ever existed except there have been belligerent operations. It is true, as pointed out by Mr. Moore, than whom no international lawyer speaks from a more abundant source of knowledge, ripe experience, and wisdom, that—

> By the term "war" is meant not the mere employment of force, but the existence of the legal condition of things in which rights are or may be prosecuted by force. Thus, if two nations declare war one against the other, war exists, though no force whatever may as yet have been employed. (VII Moore, p. 153.)

But this does not affect the main proposition that I am putting before you, namely, that war is essentially a contest between armed forces of contending States; that war continues so long as the armed forces of these States continue to contend; and that war de facto ceases when the armed contention stops. Precedent, logic, and law speak with one voice to this effect.

I turn now to the war powers conferred by the Constitution. Since, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall in the Amelia, "the whole powers of war" are "vested in Congress," it follows that such powers do not reside in any other branch of government; and it will be convenient at this stage of the discussion to have before us all those pertinent portions of the Constitution—they are not long or numerous—by which these powers are conferred and defined.

By Article I, section 8, Congress is given the power—

> To define and punish * * * offenses against the law of nations.
>
> To declare war * * * and make rules concerning captures on land and water.
> To raise and support armies. * * *
> To provide and maintain a Navy.
> To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.
> To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions.
> To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.
> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

These are the powers granted to the Congress.

The restrictions imposed on the States in reference to war are to be found in section 10 of the article, which reads:

> No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation.
> No State shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

The guaranties from the Federal Government to the States, which in fulfilling may involve war, are given in Article IV, section 4, as follows:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion. * * *

The powers and duties of the Federal Executive in case of war are to be found in Article II, section 2, where they are set forth as follows:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States: * * *
> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. * * *

The foregoing are all the direct important constitutional provisions respecting war, and from them must be derived all the war powers of the Federal Government and of its different branches.

Before admitting for your consideration some observations by Hamilton and Madison taken from the Federalist, from which we shall get a fairly clear idea of the character of the war powers granted, their extent and their purpose, I wish to offer a few preliminary observations.

The foregoing war powers, including the power to declare war—and this we must not forget—are to be found in that particular part of the Constitution—Article I, section 8—which specifies the various subjects and matters as to which Congress has the power to legislate. The instrument makes no distinction as between those powers or any of them and any others granted in the same section—indeed, some of the other powers precede and some follow—either by grammatical construction, by arrangement, or by express provision. Congress exercises its power so conveyed, as to one and as to all of the matters covered, by making laws concerning them. There is nothing to show that any law regarding any of them is to be made in a manner different from that followed in making the laws for others of them, or that, having been made, it differs from any other law made thereunder. There is nothing to indicate that as to any of them, a law having been made, it may not be revised or repealed. Indeed, the principle necessarily involved in any such contention—namely, that Congress having legislated as to any subject within its powers has thereby exhausted the power as to that subject so that it may not again or further legislate regarding it—is so obviously contrary to sound constitutional construction—as the instrument has been interpreted from the first—is so foreign to the spirit and genius of all legislation in civilized countries, that I should but make myself ridiculous were I to attempt to argue it. Therefore, whatever law Congress may make it may unmake. Nothing in the Constitution, in law, in practice, or in common sense does or could forbid this.

Nor, as is sometimes suggested, is any distinction to be made in this regard merely because the effect of some legislation is to create a status and of other legislation to enact rules for governing or regulating a status. Unless there is something in the Constitution specifically controlling to the contrary—and there is nothing—a status may with equal facility be made or unmade with appropriate safeguards against retroactivity. Nothing contrary to this can be found in the Constitution, nor in legal principle or practice.

With these preliminary remarks, I shall now read from the Federalist the observations of Hamilton and Madison regarding the character, extent, and purpose of the war powers.

Hamilton said:

> The authorities essential to the care of the common defense are these: To raise armies; to build and equip fleets; to prescribe rules for the government of both; to direct their operations; to provide for their support. These powers ought to exist without limitation, because it is impossible to foresee or to define the extent and variety of national exigencies, and the correspondent extent and variety of the means which may be necessary to satisfy them. The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite; and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed. This power ought to be coextensive with all the possible combinations of such circumstances, and ought to be under the direction of the same councils which are appointed to preside over the common defense.
> This is one of those truths which, to a correct and unprejudiced mind, carries its own evidence along with it, and may be obscured, but can not be made plainer by argument or reasoning. It rests upon axioms as simple as they are universal—the means ought to be proportioned to the end; the persons from whose agency the attainment of any end is expected ought to possess the means by which it is to be attained.
> Whether there ought to be a federal government intrusted with the care of the common defense is a question, in the first instance, open to discussion; but the moment it is decided in the affirmative it will follow that that government ought to be clothed with all the powers requisite to the complete execution of its trust. And unless it can be shown that the circumstances which may affect the public safety are reducible within certain determinate limits, unless the contrary of this position can be fairly and rationally disputed, it must be admitted as a necessary consequence that there can be no limitation of that authority, which is to provide for the defense and protection of the community, in any matter essential to its efficacy; that is, in any matter essential to the formation, direction, or support of the national forces. (No. XXIII.)

The idea of restraining the legislative authority, in the means of providing for the national defense, is one of those refinements which owe their origin to a zeal for liberty more ardent than enlightened. (No. XXVI.)

* * * * * * *

Admitting that we ought to try the novel and absurd experiment in politics of tying up the hands of government from offensive war, founded upon reasons of state; yet, certainly, we ought not to disable it from guarding the community against the ambition or enmity of other nations.

* * * * * * *

Let us recollect that peace or war will not always be left to our option; that however moderate or unambitious we may be, we can not count upon the moderation or hope to extinguish the ambition of others.

* * * * * * *

To judge from the history of mankind we shall be compelled to conclude that the fiery and destructive passions of war reign in the human breast with much more powerful sway than the mild and beneficent sentiments of peace; and that to model our political systems upon speculations of lasting tranquillity would be to calculate on the weaker springs of the human character. (No. XXXIV.) (Hamilton's Federalist.)

Madison said:

Security against foreign danger is one of the primitive objects of civil society. It is an avowed and essential object of the American Union. The powers requisite for attaining it must be effectually confided to the Federal councils.

Is the power of declaring war necessary? No man will answer this question in the negative. It would be superfluous, therefore, to enter into a proof of the affirmative. The existing confederation establishes this power in the most ample form.

Is the power of raising armies and equipping fleets necessary? This is involved in the foregoing power. It is involved in the power of self-defense.

But was it necessary to give an indefinite power of raising troops as well as providing fleets, and of maintaining both in peace as well as in war?

The answer to these questions has been too far anticipated in another place to admit an extensive discussion of them in this place. The answer indeed seems to be so obvious and conclusive as scarcely to justify such a discussion in any place. With what color of propriety could the force necessary for defense be limited by those who can not limit the force of offense. If a Federal constitution could chain the ambition or set bounds to the exertions of all other nations, then indeed might it prudently chain the discretion of its own government and set bounds to the exertions for its own safety.

How could a readiness for war in time of peace be safely prohibited, unless we could prohibit in like manner the preparations and establishments of every hostile nation? The means of security can only be regulated by the means and danger of attack. They will, in fact, be ever determined by these rules, and by no others. It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation. It is worse than in vain, because it plants in the Constitution itself necessary usurpations of power, every precedent of which is a germ of unnecessary and multiplied repetitions. (No. XLI.)

Finally I may be excused if I quote from my own remarks made on May 14, 1917, regarding this same general subject. I then said:

"When the fathers said in the Constitution that Congress should have the right to declare war and that it alone should have that power, they did not undertake to define what war is or what constitutes war. They dealt with a status that was well known; and when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the right to declare war it by necessary implication conferred upon Congress the right to do anything that in its judgment was necessary to carry that war to a successful conclusion.

"The war powers of the Constitution, in my opinion, are dormant until a status of war is declared by Congress, and then they may be exercised without limitation or qualification to the extent that the safety of the Nation demands. Of this Congress is the judge, except as the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, in the actual conduct of the war and in a case of great emergency or dire necessity, may be compelled to act. By this construction of the Constitution, Mr. President, the Constitution itself is preserved in its entirety. Indeed the exercise of the war power is the only way in which the Constitution can be preserved.

* * * * * * *

"My position is that the Congress of the United States, after a war has been declared, may pass any law which it believes is necessary for the preservation of the Nation."

This position I still maintain.

From the foregoing definitions of war, both by general writers and by those who participated in building or directing the Government, from the constitutional provisions relating to war, from the opinions of the constitutional fathers as to the character, extent, and purpose of the war powers, we may deduce, having in mind our whole constitutional system, certain elemental principles which mark for us a clear path to safety from our present situation.

We may, to begin with, note the fact that, for the purpose of discussing the war powers, the provisions of our Constitution may be divided into two great classes: First, those which are political—that is, those which deal with the form and branches of our Government and the functions and powers of those branches—and, second, those which deal with the rights and immunities under the Constitution of private individuals as members of our political entity.

I submit that the first of these, the political provisions, are beyond the reach of the war powers. We could not, for example, under any war stress short of the compelling force of another conquering sovereignty, in which event we should cease to be sovereign, provide that the functions of the Executive should be performed by the courts or that the functions of the courts should be performed by the Executive; nor could we provide that the Executive should perform the functions of the Congress. The action of the Continental Congress in bestowing legislative power on the Commander in Chief of the Army (Washington) when the Congress fled would not be possible under our constitutional system. If this fundamental principle of nondelegation of powers did not exist, any administration in power could, under the guise of a war measure enacted pursuant to the war powers, actually destroy the form of government they were sworn to maintain, and to protect which the very war powers they so used are given. A contradiction such as this is, of course, untenable. It follows that the political provisions of the Constitution are beyond the reach of any and all governmental agencies, which have only the powers expressly given to them by the people through the Constitution.

With reference to those provisions relating to the rights and immunities of private individuals the matter lies quite differently, as the following brief discussion will show.

It is fundamental to our system of government that under normal conditions the people shall enjoy the utmost freedom possible. The Government was framed and exists solely "to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity"; in other words, the Government exists to make good our independence demand for "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." To this end the minimum of restraint was levied against the individual. In any and all fields of personal action he was given the maximum of freedom. Thus we have complete freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of contract, freedom for the untrammeled acquisition and retention of property. All of these we normally enjoy fully, uninterrupted by and uncontrolled by any governmental agency. This is our great birthright for which our fathers gave their lives. All other portions of our constitutional system were granted and established for the prime purpose of making these things certain and secure to us.

But the constitutional fathers were experienced veterans in war, as I have already indicated; they had suffered because there was no means of controlling that complete freedom of property which we now enjoy; they knew how nearly our independence failed because of their inability to secure from the abundance of the people a bare sustenance. Military operations were hampered, sometimes failed, because of license in speech. The smug opulence of the British soldiery in Philadelphia; the hunger, the nakedness, the blood-stained snow of Valley Forge, all were poignant evidence of these things. In short, the great blessing to the mass in all these things was almost lost by reason of the unreasonable and utterly selfish freedom of the few.

And so from this rich experience the fathers evolved and incorporated into the plan of government the principle that when in case of war—that is, in case of actual hostilities with an enemy—as our previous discussion has shown, the needs of the mass required, then the rights of the individuals affected must give way in order that the same rights might be ultimately preserved not alone for the few but for all. Freedom of speech, of the press, of religion, freedom of contract and of acquisition and retention of property, of the few must give way when the needs of the nation at war—engaged in hostilities—required it for the good of all. The power by which needed restraints are imposed on these liberties is the war power.

Now, as war powers are bestowed in order that war may be successfully carried on, it necessarily follows, and this is vital, that such powers exist only in time of war; that is, actual hostilities. Moreover, the extent to which the people are to be deprived of their liberties is dependent entirely on the nature and extent of the war exigency. The exclusive right to determine how great the need, to what extent these liberties shall be restrained and which of them shall be touched, is in the Congress; and no other branch of Government, either executive or judicial, has authority either to enlarge or diminish in one iota the determination of Congress in these matters. And I may here observe what indeed is obvious, that in time of war Congress enjoys all its peace-time powers as well as its wartime powers, and may exercise either or both in its own sound uncontrolled discretion.

Furthermore, as I have just intimated, since war powers are given for the successful conduct of war, and for that purpose only, it necessarily follows that when the war is ended—that is, when actual hostilities cease—the war powers terminate. There is no principle of our constitutional system that is more vital or fundamental than this. Because if this were not the principle, then a mal-minded administration could provoke a war, pass war-power legislation bestowing autocratic power upon executive officers, and then, hostilities having actually ceased, refuse to make formal peace by treaty and so hold the people under an intolerable despotism until revolution would be their only recourse for relief. But reason and principle are against this. From these it follows that when the war is ended by the cessation of actual hostilities the war powers ipso facto and of necessity at that moment cease, wholly irrespective of any action either by the treaty-making power or by the Congress in reference thereto.

And do not understand me to mean by actual hostilities the grappling of armies in combat and that only. I know perfectly that campaigns must be planned and executed, that long and weary marches must be made, that intervals must elapse between battles, and that on occasion long periods must interpose between active operations. I do not refer to these periods of quiescence as war endings. By the ending of a war, the ending of actual hostilities, I mean the end of actual fighting, the time from which it is evident that the real war is over; but I do not include in period of hostilities the longer or shorter period of negotiation for peace which may follow. For even in cases where, contrary to the condition now existing between us and Germany, a state of war continues as between the warring powers after the end of hostilities and until the treaty of peace is signed, yet even then the war powers of Congress under the Constitution as affecting citizens of this Republic at home, those war powers by virtue of which our liberties are taken from us and a quasi despotism imposed upon us, must cease when the hostilities end. This is the only safe and wise principle. If, peradventure, hostilities break out anew in such circumstances, before the treaty is concluded, the war powers immediately revive and resume their dominance over the peace-time liberties. Nor is any new declaration of war necessary to accomplish this, because domestically war powers arise by virtue of the fact of war as well as by virtue of a declaration of war.

Now, if the foregoing are correct principles, and I submit they are and must be, then since the war powers come into force with the beginning of hostilities and become dormant again with the end of hostilities it necessarily follows that even Congress itself can not exercise those powers before hostilities begin nor after they end. And from this it follows that any attempt by Congress so to do is illegal and unconstitutional.

I desire now to make a few observations on the executive functions in time of war.

A little reflection shows that the two functions of Chief Executive and Commander in Chief under the Constitution need not, of necessity, be intrusted to the same person. That so vesting them is wise and convenient I grant at once.

In times of peace, the President acts primarily in all his doings as Chief Executive, charged with administering the laws of the land, but he also acts in a limited way as Commander in Chief, in charge of such standing army as we may possess. But in time of peace he gains no extra powers as Chief Executive merely because he is also Commander in Chief, and any pretense that he did so would be greeted with such resistance as would completely negative the attempt.

The principle is precisely the same in time of war. The President as Chief Executive enforces all legislation passed by Congress to carry on the war. He has, in this work, such powers and such powers only as belong to him because he is Chief Executive; but these powers are not and can not be enlarged because he is also Commander in Chief. It follows from the principles already discussed that if the war powers have lost their dominancy over peace liberties by reason of the ending of hostilities, then statutes conferring war powers have ipso facto ceased to be operative, and the President loses all powers conferred by such statutes.

As Commander in Chief the President's powers are, of course, greatly enlarged in time of war, with or without special legislation to that end, because as Commander in Chief he has charge of the operations of the Army and Navy in the field, and this gives him added powers, in the actual zone of military operations, with respect to civilian contact with the Army personnel, with respect to civilian property in the tract of hostility, and even with reference to the actual control of civilians within and possibly near his lines. If enemy territory be occupied further great powers arise in him. But as to the mass of us who are outside the zone of military operations, he exercises, merely by virtue of his being Commander in Chief, no powers whatever. The matter simplifies itself somewhat if we consider the two offices lodged in two persons.

Hamilton explained the root of the matter when he said:

> The President is to be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. In this respect his authority would be nominally the same with that of the King of Great Britain, but in substance much inferior to it. It would amount to nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces as first general and admiral of the confederacy, while that of the British King extends to the declaring of war, and to the raising and regulating of fleets and armies, all of which, by the constitution under consideration, would appertain to the legislature. (Federalist, No. LXIX.)

That all of the foregoing contentions have not strayed far afield is shown by the observations of Mr. Chief Justice Chase in his concurring opinion in Ex parte Milligan, where, speaking for himself and Justices Wayne, Swayne, and Miller, he said:

> Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has, therefore, the power to provide by law for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belong to the President as Commander in Chief. Both these powers are derived from the Constitution, but neither is defined by that instrument. Their extent must be determined by their nature and by the principles of our institutions.
> The power to make the necessary laws is in Congress; the power to execute in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each includes all authorities essential to its due exercise. But neither can the President, in war more than in peace, intrude upon the proper authority of Congress, nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President (4 Wall., 139). Both are servants of the people, whose will is expressed in the fundamental law. Congress can not direct the conduct of campaigns, nor can the President or any commander under him, without the sanction of Congress, institute tribunals for the trial and punishment of offenses, either of soldiers or civilians, unless in cases of a controlling necessity which justifies what it compels or, at least, insures acts of indemnity from the justice of the legislature.
> We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists.
> Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail.

Gathering up now the points we have so far made:

First. The war is at an end by virtue of the armistice of November 11, 1918, and of the amendments and renewals thereof, such armistice being in fact a capitulation ending hostilities by the virtual surrender of the enemy.

In this connection I call attention to the fact that while the President read to the Senate the armistice proper, he has never placed before this body the annexes referred to in that instrument.

Moreover, it appears from the treaty text—article 244, section 1, Annex III, paragraph 8—that on January 13, 1919, an armistice agreement was entered into which included provisions regarding payments due in respect of the employment of ships. This armistice has never been transmitted to the Senate, and apparently it has not been printed in this country; at least, I have never seen a copy of it. (IX Times, pt. 2, p. 236.)

It is recited in article 250 of the treaty that an armistice agreement was entered into on January 16, 1919, which provided, among other things, for the handing over of material by Germany. This has not been transmitted to the Senate nor published in this ocuntry, so far as I am aware; at any rate, I have never seen a text of it.

Article 212 of the treaty records the making of a protocol dated April 4, 1919, supplementing the armistice of November 11, 1918. This has never been transmitted to the Senate nor, so far as I know, published in this country; at least, I have never seen a copy of it.

All or a portion of these various armistices and settlements or additions thereto are still seemingly operative in whole or in part, and so form a part of the treaty of peace of Versailles. I have heretofore called attention to the fact that we were unable to pass intelligently on this treaty, indeed, we should not know its contents, unless we had also these armistices.

From reports in the public press it appears that on December 13, 1918, the armistice was extended, in accordance with its article 34, until January 17. This extension has never been submitted, and I am unaware of its terms. (Times, IX, pt. 2, p. 9.)

On December 14, according to press reports, an amendment to the armistice was signed. This may or may not be the same as the reported extension of December 13. However that may be, it is reported to contain an amendment, which has appeared in the press, but it has not been submitted to the Senate. (Id., p. 33.)

On February 16, the press states, a new armistice was signed, which contained a number of new provisions. This never has been submitted to the Senate, nor has it been printed in its entirety in the press, so far as I am advised, though a summary of it has appeared. (Id., p. 412.)

Each of these has more or less vitally affected the status of the parties with reference to peace. Germany has made through and under them that surrender of her military equipment which practically renders it impossible for her to continue the war. They have brought peace between the belligerents, and yet neither the Senate, in its capacity as part of the treaty-making power, nor the people of the country, who are so vitally interested and affected by them, have ever been advised of their terms.

I pass on to the other points we have made:

Second. The war is at an end by the "silent cessation" of hostilities, which concluded the war in fact.

Third. The war is at an end because the Government against which we specifically declared war has ceased to exist, and the President avowed we had no quarrel with the people behind it. Since our declared enemy is nonexistent, we have no one with whom to fight, hence no war.

Fourth. The war is at an end because we, together with our associates in the hostilities, negotiated with the people whom we had been fighting, now living under a new form of government, a treaty of peace, which provided in terms that the war should terminate and diplomatic relations be resumed when the treaty came into force; and because the treaty, pursuant to its provisions, did come into force in January last, when it was ratified by Germany on the one hand and three of the allied and associated powers on the other hand. By virtue of the treaty and these provisions of it the whole world, including the United States, is at peace in fact and in law.

Thus, so far as our international relations are concerned, we are legally and in fact at peace.

In so far as the domestic situation is concerned, I have shown that—

First. "War is a state or condition of Governments contending by force," "a violent struggle through the application of armed force"—in other words, war is actual hostilities.

Second. That it was so understood by our constitutional fathers, by the great Chief Justice, and by our War Department.

Third. That the power to declare war was exclusively in Congress, which created the status of war by a law which, like any other law, could be amended, modified, or repealed.

Fourth. That the purpose of the war powers of the Constitution was to give to the National Government the legal power and practical ability to conduct a successful war; that is, actual hostilities.

Fifth. That war powers being given to enable the Government successfully to wage actual hostilities, the powers could not be exercised before a war was legally declared or de facto existing, nor after actual hostilities had ceased, and that the very fact of ending hostilities ended the war powers without any action whatever by Congress.

Sixth. That the powers of the President came from two sources, that of the Chief Executive and that of Commander in Chief; that these two capacities were separate and distinct, wholly independent one from the other; that the powers of neither capacity could be invoked to augment the other; that he possessed no extraordinary powers as Chief Executive, save only and to the extent such powers were conferred by statute, which, to authorize action by him, must be duly and legally in operation.

It results from all of the foregoing facts and principles that the war has ended internationally, both as a matter of fact and of law; that domestically the war powers ceased with the end of actual hostilities; and that, therefore, we are already at peace, both internationally and domestically, without any further act by either the executive or legislative branches of the Government.

With the status and legal sufficiency of the acts of the executive branch performed since the termination of hostilities under the terms of the war-time statutes and involving actual war powers we are not now concerned.

The foregoing discussion of facts and principles brings the consideration of the resolution to where it becomes largely a matter of decision regarding its mere wording.

The resolution as proposed reads:

> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the joint resolution of Congress passed April 6, 1917, "declaring a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States, and making provisions to prosecute the same, be, and the same is hereby, repealed and said state of war is hereby declared at an end, * * * and the President is hereby requested immediately to open negotiations with the Government of Germany with a view to reestablishing fully the friendly relations and commercial intercourse existing between the United States and Germany prior to said war."

The resolution also includes Austria.

This resolution provides for the repeal of the authority for waging war—that is, the declaration of war—thus leaving the Executive without the legal power to wage war, and so putting us domestically on a basis of peace with our peace-time rights and liberties again dominant and fully restored to us.

I have already shown that the repeal of this declaration of war is merely a legislative act, no different in character from the declaring of war, and that sound constitutional theory requires recognition of the elemental principle that Congress may modify or repeal any law which it passed.

As a matter of law and of fact we are, as I have already shown, at peace with Germany, first because of the terms of the armistice of November 11, 1918, its amendments and renewals; second, because of the "silent ceasing" of hostilities; third, because of the disappearance, the extinction, of the Government against which we declared war; and, fourth, because of the negotiation by us and our allies or associates in the war with the people who were lately our enemies, and the ratification by our allies or associates and our enemies, of a treaty of peace which specifically provided both for the termination of hostilities to be followed by a resumption of diplomatic relations, and also for the status that should exist during our future peace-time intercourse; which treaty is now in force and observed everywhere except in the United States, and has in fact and in international law brought peace to the whole world, including ourselves.

Having thus in law and in fact international peace, having nothing left but a domestic status of war created by a legislative declaration of war, with no hostilities heretofore or now existent or possible in the territory over which this paper-war status exists, it is not only legally sound, but economically, morally, and patriotically necessary and indispensable that we at once repeal the declaration of war and so immediately end the despotic war powers with which a power-maddened administration continues to misrule this great people.

Thus peace having come to us in our domestic affairs, there will remain for care only the adjustment of our future peace-time relationships with Germany. It is probable that practically all of the things we would desire from Germany would flow to us from the treaty of Versailles even without our participation as a ratifying power. But grant this to be true, yet wisdom requires the negotiation of a separate treaty between the United States and Germany which should provide reciprocal rights and obligations between us and that country alone.

In presenting the treaty of Versailles to this body for advice and consent to its ratification, the President said:

> And in the settlements of the peace we have sought no special reparation for ourselves, but only the restoration of right and the assurance of liberty everywhere that the effects of the settlement were to be felt. We entered the war as the disinterested champions of right and we interested ourselves in the terms of the peace in no other capacity.

An examination of the treaty terms does not afford a happy justification for this statement, for by the treaty we became, as one of the principal allied and associated powers, with our associates coowners of the following property, rights, and privileges: A part of German territory in Europe and of all of Germany's territorial overseas possessions; of parts of Schleswig in trust for Germany or Denmark; of all the German national property, imperial and state, and the private property of the ex-Emperor and other royal personages, without compensation for that in the colonies, with compensation for that in Nemel; of the public utilities in areas ceded to the principal allied and associated powers; of all German cables, reaching all over the world; of practically all German merchant-marine shipping and of certain portions of her inland shipping; of bonds in the total fixed amount of 100,000,000,000 of gold marks, and of a commitment for an indefinite further issue; of certain amounts of gold specified; of German claims against Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey; of a maximum of 200,000 tons of shipping per year to be built by Germany; and as single owner in our own right of all American securities, certificates, deeds or other documents of title, including shares of stock, debentures, debenture stocks, or other obligations of any company incorporated in accordance with our laws, as also all materials, and so forth, which may have been taken from our citizens during the war.

By this same treaty our citizens became the beneficiaries, fully and completely, with the nationals of other allied and associated powers, of restrictions accepted, grants made, and obligations incurred by Germany with reference to her external commerce in the matter of duties, charges, and commerce restrictions, reciprocity treaties, customs provisions, shipping, freedom of transit, free zones, the internationalization of her great internal waterways, railway transit, and the Kiel Canal. We are likewise the beneficiaries of the principle accepted by Germany that Germany is responsible for herself and for her allies for all loss and damage to which the allied and associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies, and this includes—under the broad wording of the provision—not alone the loss and damage resulting from the operation of Germany and her allies, but loss suffered as the result by the allied and associated powers.

One stands stupefied with amazed wonderment at what we might have done in the way of getting if we had not taken such a lofty attitude as a philanthropic disinterested champion of right.

While not now waiving our rights to all the foregoing, ultimately we want, sir, only those parts which will provide for the compensation of our citizens for the losses they suffered because of the war, and those parts which will insure them equality of treatment with the nationals of the most favored nation in all matters pertaining to residence, business, profession, trade, navigation, and commerce. It is to secure these, which we have a right to expect and demand, that the proviso of the resolution before us is drafted. This proviso reads:

Provided, however, That all property of the Imperial German Government or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals which was on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of the Government of the United States, or of any of its officers, agents, or employees from any source, or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States and no disposition thereof made, except as shall be specifically hereafter provided by Congress, until such time as the German Government has by treaty with the United States, ratification thereof to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, made suitable provisions for the satisfaction of the claims against the German Government, of all persons wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, whether such persons have suffered through the acts of the German Government or its agents since July 31, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, directly or indirectly, through the ownership of shares of stock in German, American, or other corporations or otherwise, and until the German Government has given further undertakings and made provisions by treaty, to be ratified by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for granting to persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States most favored nation treatment, whether the same be national or otherwise, in all matters affecting residence, business, profession, trade, navigation, and commerce and industrial property rights, and confirming to the United States all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States during the war, whether in respect to the property of the German Government or German nationals and waiving any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of such treaty; any existing treaty between the United States and Germany to the contrary notwithstanding.

In determining the damages our citizens have suffered, as contemplated in this proviso, we must proceed in accordance with the established beneficent and enlightened rules and principles of international law as they have heretofore obtained between civilized Christian nations.

To what end has all this juggling with obvious facts and universally recognized principles been maintained? The answer is easy and known to all. The purpose has been to coerce the Senate to approve the treaty of Versailles, a treaty that is almost universally discredited in all its parts. The majority of its negotiators concede this. Its economic terms are impossible; its League of Nations is an aggravated imitation of the worst features of the ill-fated and foolish Holy Alliance of a century ago. It promises little but mischief, unless recast on such radical lines as will entirely obliterate its identity.

It has been said that reservations proposed in the Senate Americanize the league. This, of course, is not true. A more accurate statement of the effect of those reservations is that they tend to make it safer for America to enter the league by refusing to be bound in many important matters by its action. But it is not enough that the league shall be made safe for America; it must be made safe for all who enter it and safe for the world. As I see it nothing could be fraught with more danger than any nation having a specially insured relation to a league where the other members are subject to the dangers against which the immune nation attempts to secure itself. The only justification for a league of nations, and at least the ostensible purpose of the league embodied in the treaty of Versailles, is to secure the peace of the world. The peace of the world is not assured but threatened if 31, say, out of 32 nations so curtail their liberties and sovereignty that a political council may direct them to do what as free men they will not do when the test of allegiance between league and country arises. It is by no means the question that the other nations may consent to such an arrangement. The real question is, Does such a structure rest upon solid foundations? It seems to me not, as the rights and obligations of those who are associated for a common purpose should be reciprocal. If we, by reservations, withdraw ourselves from obligations to our associates in the league it is rather difficult to find what obligations our associates will owe to us, the limited partner.

I have before me Mr. Balfour's views, expressed on November 11, 1919, that—

If one of us begins to make reservations I confess that I think the future of the League of Nations is dark indeed.

From a brilliant article by Mr. Arthur Page—one of the many intelligent Englishmen now realizing that the menace of the league to English sovereignty and freedom far outweighs any material advantages accruing to Great Britain under the League of Nations—entitled "Vienna 1815: Versailles 1919," published in Blackwood's Magazine for March, I quote:

Lord Castlereagh, on the 5th of May, 1820, expressed the opinion that "England must act, not by the laws other powers may think fit to lay down * * * but from those maxims which a system of government, strongly popular and national, has irresistibly imposed upon us." His advice is as true to-day as it was a hundred years ago, and should be followed not only in Great Britain but in each and every one of the King's Dominions. A league of nations and a league of empire are mutually exclusive. It is not possible to owe allegiance to the King and also to the League of Nations any more than a man can at the same time serve God and mammon. The choice must be made, and now is the appointed time. "How long halt ye between two opinions?" God grant that the British Empire will rest true to itself and choose aright! Then, and then only, will it stand foursquare to all the winds that blow, and in saving itself it will also provide the only sure guaranty of peace and bring light and hope into a troubled world.

These observations apply with even more force to the great democracy of the West.

The Parisian peacemakers should have confined their activities to making peace, and then, as soon as world conditions permitted participation therein by all peoples, initiated an international conference to formulate for submisson to the nations of the world with a view to adoption by them an arrangement providing for the codification of international law, the establishment of a court of international justice, and the outlawry of war—this arrangement to be as complete, comprehensive, and compelling as shall be consistent with human rights and human liberty, with the progress of civilization, with the preservation and fostering of free institutions, and with the inherent right of every people to be secure, to enjoy peace, and to work out unhampered its own destiny subject only to like equal rights of all other peoples.

It remains open to us, so long as we are unbound by the proposed discredited covenant, to initiate such an agreement among the nations.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, ETC.

Mr. NEW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], to add at the end of the bill a new section to be know as section 3.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will have to do that. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that there are Senators who are impatient of any discussion of the pending measure, and I have no doubt that there are beneficiaries of this proposed legislation who are likewise impatient. During the war Congress accepted the recommendations of executive officials with respect to the imperative necessity of appropriations needed for the prosecution of the war. It was not uncommon for bills carrying hundreds of millions of dollars to be passed through this body with little if any discussion. Of course, the committees reporting the bills gave consideration to the various items embraced therein. However, it must be confessed that there was rather undue haste in the passage of many important measures. Perhaps the habit was formed of enacting legislation in haste and without discussion which it will be difficult to free ourselves from.

During the present session legislation of great importance has been swiftly passed through the Senate. Most of the appropriation bills have received but indifferent attention, and but little if any discussion when they were brought to our attention. Years ago, when the revenues of the country were smaller and expenditures of the Government modest, statesmen of national and, indeed, international reputation scrutinized with the utmost care items found within appropriation bills and, generally speaking, the measures containing general legislation which were presented for action upon the part of the Senate.

One of the vices of American legislative bodies is the haste and lack of consideration attending the passage of important measures. Legislation that changes accepted industrial and political policies is often rushed through Congress and State legislatures without a proper conception of their meaning or consequences. Sufficient proof of this statement is found in the frequent demands made by the people for the repeal of all sorts of laws. A review of the proceedings of the legislative bodies referred to reveals the fact that much of our legislation is fragmentary, incomplete, and often incoherent, and consisting in a large degree of modifications or repeals of prior enactments. And if an examination is made of the decisions of appellate courts of our land it will be discovered that our judicial tribunals are constantly called upon to construe the imperfect and often the unconstitutional enactments of legislative bodies.

The bill under consideration calls for an annual appropriation of millions of dollars. It proposes the establishment and continuation of a policy of granting pensions to persons whose names for a few days appeared upon the rolls of the military and naval branches of the Government, though they performed no actual military service and are in perfect health and in the enjoyment of large incomes. In other words, it establishes or at least reaffirms the policy of granting service pensions. In the remarks which I submitted upon this bill yesterday I called attention to the fact that it was not, properly speaking, a pension measure to provide for those who were wounded or injured or received or incurred disabilities in the line of service. The bill boldly and broadly declares for the pensioning of every one whose name appears upon the records of the Army and Navy during the Spanish-American War. In order to receive the pension it is not necessary or essential that the individual actually rendered military or naval service or was upon the field of battle or in Cuba or the Philippine Islands or where any of the forces of the enemy were. There is no requirement that the person in order to obtain a pension must have been injured while in the service or must be suffering from disability of any character or description resulting from such service. The bill provides that any person who may suffer from any mental or physical disability, no matter how temporary or how unimportant it is, is entitled to a pension if it incapacitates him from the performance of manual labor as to render him unable to earn a support. Such mental or physical disability may have resulted from some accident in private employment, or in connection with activities not related to the Army or Navy. Indeed, it may be traceable to some accident immediately preceding the disability or from some cause wholly independent of his connection with the Army. It also provides if the disability is permanent he may obtain a pension even though the permanent disability is confessedly not traceable to the military or naval service but of some recent cause.

Under this provision any person who enlisted during the Spanish-American War and remained in the Army or Navy for 90 days or more, though no actual military or naval service was rendered, and during the entire period such person was within the United States may be entitled to a pension if after the passage of this bill he is incapacitated from permanent manual labor of such a character as to prevent him from earning support. If such person had never worked or had a fortune, but at any time after the passage of the bill suffered from a disability, even though it arose from an accident or some cause wholly apart from the service in the Army years ago, he would be entitled to a pension under the terms of this bill. And such is the case even though he is the possessor of a large fortune and would not have performed manual labor even if no disability had ever arisen.

The bill further provides, as was admitted yesterday by the Senator from Indiana having the bill in charge, that whenever the age of 62 years was reached by any person who served 90 days or more during the War with Spain or in the Philippine insurrection or the China relief expedition, the pension would be paid him, and that notwithstanding the fact that he was suffering from no disability and was in perfect health and physical condition and the possessor of property of the value of millions.

Mr. President, the view prevailed in the country for many years, and it is the view now, in my opinion, of many people of the United States, that liberal pensions should be paid to all who received injuries while in the military or naval service of the United States or incurred disabilities which in any way incapacitated them from earning a livelihood, but it is the modern view of many people that pensions should be paid merely because a person was connected for a few days with the military or naval service of the United States. In my opinion the majority of the American people, when they understand the policy which is being fastened upon this Nation, will revolt against it. Of course, I appreciate the fact that powerful influences are at work to secure the passage of this bill. It will be regarded as a precedent to aid in securing the passage of bonus measures or other legislation in behalf of those who served in the recent war with Germany.

Let me inquire what difference in principle is there between giving a pension for a few days' service in the Spanish-American War and giving a pension for a few days' service in the great World War? If the policy of bestowing service pensions is to be adopted, then service pensions should be given to all whether their connection with the military or naval branch of the United States was recent or more remote. If a man in perfect health, and possessed of wealth and position, who served for a few days in the Spanish-American War, is entitled to a pension, what reason is there for denying a similar bounty to those who served at a later date in like manner? And certainly if pensions are granted to individuals who were never injured, and whose health is in no way impaired, and who were never upon the battle field or away from some safe camp in the United States, what excuse can be offered for refusing to give pensions to the brave and gallant soldiers who actually fought upon the battle fields of France and Belgium and who gave months of their lives to actual military service under situations which involved constant danger to life and limb?

I have repeatedly said that I shall be glad to join in any rational and just pension bill. I shall be glad to support generous provisions for all who were wounded or injured or who are suffering in any way because of their military or naval services. Indeed, I am willing to go further and support measures that will afford relief to those who have served their country in the hour of danger, and now, because of their advancing years and their physical and mental ailments, are incapable of providing for their support and maintenance and are without adequate means therefor. And, as I have also reiterated, the Government should generously care for the widows and orphans of those who gave their lives for their country.

In my opinion this bill will establish a policy from which the Government can not escape, and which will culminate in the expenditure of not only hundreds of millions of dollars but billions of dollars. Already a propaganda is being conducted in the United States in favor of giving bounties and gratuities to the extent of billions of dollars to those who were in the war through which we have just passed. Will they not find justification for their demands in this character of legislation as well as other measures which have received the sanction of Congress?

I propound the question in no critical spirit, Why should a man receive a pension who enlisted in the War with Spain and went to some camp, and there wore the uniform for a few days, rendered no actual military service, did not go beyond the seas, did not participate in any battles in Cuba, did not go to the Philippines and assist there in overcoming the insurrection and is suffering from no ailments whatever? Why should he, when his health is good, when he is the possessor of wealth, perhaps to the extent of millions of dollars, and receiving an annual income of $10,000 or more, be the beneficiary of a pension at the hands of the Government? There may be adequate reasons and I am trying to have them pointed out.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the object and purpose of the pension system will be prostituted if we go to the extent demanded by some persons in our land.

One provision of the bill is to the effect that any person who has attained the age of 62 years shall be entitled to a pension. If there were any limitation to the effect that the individual must be suffering from some disability, or is unable to make a livelihood, there might be some justification for the bill, and I ask the Senator having the bill in charge whether he will accept an amendment to the effect that this provision shall apply only to those who are suffering disabilities, or who are incapable of earning a livelihood?

Mr. President, while there would still be objections—valid and strong—to the bill, I would be inclined to vote for it if this suggested amendment were accepted; but if the policy is to pension men, regardless of their wealth, regardless of the condition of their health, and announce baldly and nakedly the purpose to pension all, regardless of their wealth or of their needs, who have attained a certain age, then I must express my disapproval of the same. Will the Senator accept an amendment of the character to which I have just referred?

Mr. NEW. No, Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana does not care to accept such an amendment.

Mr. KING. I had suspected, I will say frankly, that the Senator from Indiana would not accept that amendment. I have no doubt that the Senator from Indiana has sufficient votes—and votes to spare—to pass through the Senate this bill or any other kind of a pension bill. I have no doubt, Mr. President, but what any kind of a pension bill can receive the approval of a majority of the Members of this body. Apparently there is such a powerful body back of this measure——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). The Senator from Utah will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 8078.

THE DYE INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fall	Keyes	Phelan
Borah	France	King	Sheppard
Brandegee	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Simmons
Calder	Gay	McCumber	Smoot
Capper	Glass	McKellar	Sterling
Chamberlain	Hale	McLean	Swanson
Colt	Harris	Nelson	Thomas
Culberson	Harrison	New	Townsend
Curtis	Henderson	Norris
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Overman
Elkins	Kenyon	Page

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. NUGENT, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WARREN answered to their names when called.

Mr. BALL, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. LODGE, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. KNOX, Mr. COMER, Mr. HARDING, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. REED, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

[Mr. THOMAS resumed the speech begun by him on Monday. After having spoken for two hours and a half, he yielded the floor for the day.]

LANDS OF CROW TRIBE.

During the delivery of Mr. THOMAS's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. CURTIS, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. KENDRICK conferees on the part of the Senate.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas what is the status of the so-called water-power bill?

Mr. CURTIS. I am not a member of that committee. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has charge of that bill.

Mr. THOMAS. The RECORD discloses that the conference report was agreed to by the House on yesterday.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Utah I will say that I discussed the matter a short time ago with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who advised me that the conference report would not be brought up in the Senate for consideration before next week.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator from Idaho.

ADJOURNMENT.

After the conclusion of Mr. THOMAS's speech for the day,

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 6, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 5, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Chaplain Milton O. Beebe, Walter Reed United States Army General Hospital, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, may we be wise. May we have understanding of the meaning of things. May we give ourselves to the task of learning Thy law, and having learned, may we fill each day as it brightens with honest endeavor. Thou art forever fulfilling Thy Holy Word. May we be among those who are inspired with a great expectation. May we ask of Thee in perfect confidence that Thou wilt grant our petitions. May we seek with that quiet assurance that Thou wilt fill us with understanding. May we conduct ourselves as men who are looking and ready for Thy coming. Give us a keen insight into the events of to-day. May we seek to enlarge the religious faculty of our lives that everything we do shall speak eloquently of our fellowship with Thee. For those who create our laws and formulate our policies we ask divine guidance and direction, that our Nation may stand in Thy sight and the sight of men as eminently worthy. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. CRAGO, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the conference report on the bill (S. 2448) for the relief of certain officers of the United States Army and for other purposes, which was ordered printed under the rule.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I desire to ask the status of the river and harbor bill that was passed by the Senate with amendments about a week ago.

The SPEAKER. It is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. DUPRÉ. May I inquire from the majority leader if any steps are contemplated at an early date to send the bill to conference?

Mr. MONDELL. The chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY], is home. He has been quite ill and is still ill, I understand. We have been very much in hopes that he would speedily recover in order that he might be here and serve as the chairman of the House conferees. He is very familiar with the bill and an exceedingly efficient and effective man, as we all know. We need him very much in connection with this matter. This bill has been doubled in the Senate. The House is not in favor of that increase, and, in my opinion, will not agree to it or any considerable part of it at any time this session, and it is very important that the chairman of the committee be here if possible.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman is aware that the chairman has notified a certain Member of the House that he can not come?

Mr. MONDELL. If it should prove to be the case that the chairman can not be here, other arrangements must be made.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY], whose speedy recovery I also hope for, has notified a Member of this House that he can not be here for the consideration of this conference report?

Mr. MONDELL. I think he has, and yet the gentleman from Iowa is a devoted public servant, and if he should recover, if he should get better in the near future, he would himself desire to be here, as we desire to have him.

Mr. DUPRÉ. And I should also want his presence. Do I gather from the gentleman as saying that if Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa can not be here at the end of this week or at the early part of next week, which can be ascertained by that time, the gentleman from Wyoming will take steps to send this measure to conference?

Mr. MONDELL. Within a reasonable time the matter will be taken up.

Mr. DUPRÉ. It has been on the Speaker's table——

Mr. MONDELL. Not an unusual length of time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Not when the gentleman from Wyoming is opposed to the legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, "the gentleman from Wyoming" is in favor, and always has been, of the river and harbor bill. He is one of the few Members in this House who vote for river and harbor bills, and he never has any items in the bill for his district. I will say very frankly that "the gentleman from Wyoming," and, in his opinion, a very great majority of this House, do not believe that the very great increase in the river and harbor bill is necessary in the public interest or in any way justifiable at this time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The way to adjust that is to send the bill to conference and let the sense of the House be taken on the subject. As long as the bill remains on the Speaker's table we will never get anywhere, which will not be altogether adverse to the views of some of the Members of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. There will be no loss to the Federal Treasury from the bill so long as it is on the Speaker's table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 13890, being a bill to regulate the dealing in, distributing, importing, and manufacturing of sugar, and to include therein extracts of an article in the Christian Science Monitor under the date of May 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the sugar question, and to insert therein an article from the Christian Science Monitor. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, what are the extracts that the gentleman wishes to put in?

Mr. HOWARD. They are from the Christian Science Monitor, under date of May 3, 1920, commenting on the fact that there are too many drones in the sugar hive.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know how the time stands on the general debate on the sundry civil bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has used 3 hours and 57 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] 5 hours and 21 minutes. The gentleman from Tennessee has used 1 hour and 24 minutes more than the gentleman from Iowa has used.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13870; and, pending that, I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] if we can not agree upon the remainder of the time for general debate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I have additional requests for over two hours.

Mr. GOOD. It seems to me that we must bring this general debate to a close pretty soon. I think we have been very liberal in the debate, as the time will show. I was wondering if the gentleman could get along with one hour of general debate on his side and with two hours on this side, which would give the gentleman considerably more time on his side than on this.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There has been great liberality in this debate. Of course, we all know this is the last appropriation bill that will be considered in the House during this session, with the exception of the general deficiency bill, upon which there is usually very little time for general debate.

It will probably be the last opportunity that many Members will have for discussing the subjects in which they are interested. I do not see how it is possible, unless you absolutely deny some Member who wants some little time, for me to agree upon an hour to a side. I will say that there are two Members who desire an hour between themselves, and the other time is limited to 15 minutes and 10 minutes. If the gentleman from Iowa will agree upon an hour and three-quarters, or possibly an hour and a half, I might be able to get along with it, although there would be a number that would be either cut down or denied.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I am advised by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that there will be some bills brought up where time for general debate will be granted, so that, it seems to me, it is not a denial to Members of the right to express themselves upon subjects that they want to discuss.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the time for general debate be limited to three hours and a half, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and two hours by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to three hours and a half, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and two hours by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] will take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13870, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13870, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few common-sense remarks on the very important subject of taxation. I understand, of course, that these remarks are not of the style that will travel beyond the doors of this Chamber. Following the usual fate of anything of that kind they will probably be embalmed in the files of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, whereas any sensational statement would travel on the wings of the lightning to the four corners of our country.

The subject of taxation has been under discussion much of late. Singularly enough, most of those who have discussed it have thought it was a very simple one. Time was when in this country such was the fact. It was easy to proceed with taxation plans because everything that was proposed had already been tried. No new plans were offered and no new plans were necessary. But the burdens which the Great War has laid upon us have made it necessary that we should propose new kinds of taxation and that all kinds of taxation should be considered. Taxation has become complex and intricate, and of all the intricate problems that I know of in taxation the most intricate is that of taxing the so-called war profiteers. I am aware that this subject is not at all entertaining. I am aware that it is somewhat difficult to follow. For that reason I shall especially appreciate the attention of those who do me the honor of listening to what I have to say upon the subject.

By "war profiteer" is usually understood one who, during the period of the war, made unreasonable and unconscionable profits. To many persons it seemed as if there was nothing easier than to lay a tax that would reduce those profits to the proper amount and to force the concerns who had profiteered to contribute a just amount to the support of the Government. To that end numerous bills have been introduced, most of which were based upon the very simple plan of taking the average profits of a corporation for one, two, or three years previous to the war, and after ascertaining what the average profits of the corporation had been during the war and up to this time laying a heavy tax upon the difference between the two. Bill after bill of that kind has been introduced, and gentlemen have thought that this method would reach the war profiteer and nobody else. As a matter of fact it would reach only a part of the war profiteers, and in many instances it would fall upon the very people that they did not want to tax.

Let me illustrate this by a simple example that anybody can understand if he wishes. I know of a canning company—and there are many instances of the kind—that up to the time of the war had never made a success of its business. The stockholders that first went into it lost everything they put into it and sold out to another set of stockholders, and the second set of stockholders lost everything that they put into it and sold out to somebody else. Up to the time of the war the concern had never made a dollar, but, on the contrary, had lost large sums. After the war period began this concern succeeded in making a very reasonable profit, as I understand, somewhere around 10 per cent, but not nearly enough to recoup the losses which it sustained in the prewar years.

In cases where a loss was sustained instead of a profit being made before the war the plan of taxing the difference between the prewar income and the income made during the war at the rate of 50 per cent to 80 per cent would in some instances take all the profits made after the war and considerably more. It would absolutely bankrupt many concerns.

That is not all. Even as to those who made large profits, and in many instances as to some of them who made the greatest profits, I will show that a tax levied in that manner will not reach them at all. We had a tax on war profits in the law of 1918 of 80 per cent. Ordinarily that would seem as if it were high enough, and as if that certainly would reach the war profiteer; but, as a matter of fact, we found in the Committee on Ways and Means that it would not reach some of the very men that ought to pay most, and at my suggestion we put into this law an alternative provision that whenever the ordinary excess-profits tax, which ran up to 60 per cent on the higher profits, would take a greater sum than the 80 per cent on the war profits, then the excess profits should be imposed. I am informed by one of the Treasury experts that in nearly half of the cases this excess-profits tax imposed a greater tax than the 80 per cent on so-called war profits. It was found necessary also to limit the application of this war-profits tax by provisos and exceptions in order to keep it from operating unjustly and taxing concerns which made little or nothing before the war, and other provisos designed to take care of the numerous cases where the tax would have bankrupted certain small corporations. With all our care we found subsequently that many small concerns had been most unreasonably and unjustly taxed.

The fact is that the difference between what a person or a corporation made before the war and during the war in the greater number of cases is not any just measure of the amount of taxes which ought to be imposed. There are thousands of concerns which lost money before the war and for the first time made profits during the war and no unreasonable profit then. These concerns were not engaged in manufacturing war material, but they were scattered all over the country and were mostly small concerns. While we used for a time the war-profits tax, we never had a tax that worked so unjustly in so many cases, notwithstanding the efforts we made to prevent such results. The war-profits tax has been abandoned in every country. The best way to reach the profiteers who are in fact making unreasonable and unconscionable profits is through the income tax. If the rates are not high enough to do this, make them higher, and I will join with the gentlemen who desire to do so, but I observe that some of the gentlemen who are the most enthusiastic about taxing the war profits do not seem particularly desirous of raising the income-tax rates. The reasons can be easily guessed.

Now, I realize most painfully that any man who stands here and suggests that there might possibly be any objection to a blanket tax laid in this manner is liable to find himself attacked, his motives misinterpreted, and his statements perverted. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] in the speech which he made last Saturday referred to the course which I took at the time when the revenue bill of 1917 was under consideration.

At that time I opposed an amendment which was offered which imposed a tax of 30 per cent on war profits in addition to the excess-profits tax of 60 per cent already contained in the bill. The amendment was of the kind that I have just described, and was of such a nature that instead of reaching the man whom it was desired to tax it would fall upon those whom it was not intended to tax, and in many cases exempt those who ought to be taxed most.

I think it is obvious from what I have already said that such a provision would not work, and I have no idea that it was ever expected to work; in fact, everyone knew at the time that there was not the slightest possibility of the amendment being adopted. Nevertheless, I have been criticized because I voted against that amendment. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] in his speech said I gave my reasons for voting against the amendment, but he did not state what those reasons were. Let me read you the reasons that I gave at that time for voting against that amendment, as you will find them on page 2548 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session, Sixty-fifth Congress. I then stated:

> There is no provision in his amendment for a case where the corporation or partnership that has been assessed was not in business at all before the time of the war. There is no provision in it with reference to a case where the profits of a corporation have been merely nominal before the war nor where they actually consisted of a loss before the war, nor where there has been a change of ownership, nor where the three years before the war have been years of abnormal depression, nor for a case where the capital has only just commenced to be remunerative. I could go on here for half an hour if I had the time and show the hardships a provision of this kind would work if we undertook to put it in force in this manner.

Further on in the course of my remarks I said—page 2549:

> Let me call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment offered by my colleague would permit the Standard Oil companies which made 200 per cent before the war to pay nothing if they made 200 per cent after the war, and if they made more, only on what they made over 200 per cent.

Gentlemen may think this is a fanciful case. It is not a fanciful case. A number of the Standard Oil companies were making more than 200 per cent before the war, and shares of stock in some of them having only $100 face value were worth from $800 to $1,000 each. That was the reason why we put in the revenue bill of 1918 the alternative provision that if the 80 per cent war tax would not take as much as the excess-profits tax, the tax should be levied in accordance with the excess-profits provision.

Now, the argument of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] was to the effect that I objected to this amendment on account of the rate. I made no objection to it on account of the rate. I objected to this amendment and voted against it, as I would again, and as every Member of this House ought to vote if he thought there was any danger of its becoming a law—I voted against it because it would not work equitably or justly and would not reach the parties whom it was intended to reach, but, on the contrary, would for the most part strike at concerns which had made only reasonable profits.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that whatever tax is put upon any of these large concerns, they add it to their cost of production, so that it has to be paid by those who purchase their articles afterwards, so that if the Standard Oil Co. or any other large concern had to pay 80 per cent, they added that to their cost of production as overhead charges, and the consumer paid it the next year in purchasing the article?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am aware that that theory is advanced by many tax experts. I never have been in entire accord with it, but I will say that if the argument is correct that a small retail-sales tax would always be added to the price of the article sold, a big tax which was levied upon the manufacturer, when nobody could tell anything about what he was doing, would certainly be added to the cost. The manufacturers probably add the tax when they can. I think they admit that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In this connection I want to say a few words with reference to the sales tax in the bill introduced by Mr. FORDNEY, which, I suppose the gentleman understands, never got any further than to be introduced, as it has never been reported by the committee. The sales tax in this bill was a tax on final sales and not a turnover tax, but the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] says that, whatever anyone else may say, he knows that it was practically agreed that the money that was necessary for the adjusted compensation of the soldiers "should be raised by a turnover sales tax on each sale from the producer to the consumer. Whatever anyone else may say," he continues, "I know that was practically agreed upon." It is quite evident that the gentleman from South Dakota does not care what anyone else may say, and it would seem that he also does not care what he himself says. Since he has indulged in this kind of language, I suppose I may be permitted to use it also and state that I do not care what the gentleman from South Dakota may say, I know that such a tax was never agreed upon. Anyone who has examined the bill knows that it did not make any provision for such tax, and that the final-sales tax that it contained made provision for only about one-half of the money needed. I was there during all the proceedings and the gentleman from South Dakota was not.

As I stated in my remarks last Tuesday, I do not favor the repeal of the excess-profit tax and I have never looked favorably upon a sales tax except as a last resort, and then only when it is so small that its effect as to any particular individual could not be noticeable. I have been ready at all times to impose the rates that would bring the most money in taxation from those that were making unreasonable profits, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from South Dakota spent the greater part of his hour in attempting to show the contrary. Whether such has been my course in committee, where these matters are determined, I am quite content to leave to the decision of such men of the opposite party as the Democratic leader of the House at the time these revenue bills were adopted [Mr. KITCHIN], whose absence from the House we all now so much regret, or the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], also a member of the Ways and Means Committee. I mention these names because the attention of these gentlemen has been particularly called to my course when these great revenue bills were prepared.

Moreover, the RECORD shows that in the general debate upon the 1917 bill I stated that while we had doubled the excess-profit tax I thought the excess-profit tax ought to be higher. I was advocating at that time higher excess-profit taxes. It was not my fault that there were not higher rates in the bill at that time. Subsequently, in the bill of 1918, we did put in higher rates than the rates of the revenue bill of 1917, but a provision was inserted in the bill of 1918 that those taxes should apply only for the calendar year 1918, and that for the calendar year 1919 and thereafter the 80 per cent war-profit tax should be taken out, and the highest rate upon excess profits should be 40 per cent. That provision was put in the bill upon the recommendation of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not state this for the purpose of making any political issue at this time, because in what I say now I want to avoid anything in the nature of political discussion. I only mention it in order to show that I opposed this reduction at the time it was made. I took the position that that tax ought not to be reduced. A majority of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, including the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], took the same position, and I think that subsequent events, in the fact that our revenues have not equaled our expenditures, have shown that it was a mistake to reduce it. Nevertheless, because I have at some times desired to take a common-sense view of this matter of taxation, because I have opposed amendments that would not work justly and were not workable, I find that an effort has been made to make the public believe that I was willing that the wealthy should escape taxation. I am painfully aware that in what I have to say to-day, if any currency is given to my remarks at all, it is very likely they will be distorted in the same manner.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some practical suggestions with reference to changes in our revenue law. These propositions are workable. They would collect a large amount of revenue from those who are best able to pay. They would not affect business, for they would lay no burdens upon it. Only those who have been unusually prosperous will pay any of these taxes.

These amendments would mitigate some hardships imposed by the revenue laws and would make our taxation more just than it is now. At present our laws encourage the wealthy to put their money into tax-exempt securities. A man whose surtaxes are 50 per cent and whose total income taxes are 58 per cent finds that a 5 per cent municipal bond pays him better than an investment that pays 10 per cent but which is subject to taxes. The result is that there is a constant flow of the money of the millionaires into tax-exempt securities, which must be checked or these men will escape paying their just share of taxes. I hold that our revenue laws should provide that for the purpose of computing surtax the income on tax-exempt securities should be included, although the income from securities is not itself taxed.

Some time last winter I introduced a bill to that effect. I have carefully gone over the constitutional features in relation to it and I am satisfied that the provision is constitutional, and in this I have the support of the Solicitor of the Treasury. I know that it would greatly increase our revenue and have the effect of keeping the income taxes on high incomes up to the present level, whereas you have only to look at the returns to see that they are falling off every day. I wish to make our laws so that the multimillionaire who puts his investments into tax-exempt securities shall not have his surtaxes reduced by this process upon any income that he gets from securities that are not exempt.

I know that this provision is just, and I am satisfied it is constitutional, and I hope the time will soon arrive when it will be adopted.

Second, I propose a tax on corporations issuing stock dividends at the rate of 15 per cent of the face value of dividends so issued. March 15, 1920, shortly after the Supreme Court decision, I introduced a bill to that effect. I think there is no question as to the constitutionality of a bill placing a tax on corporations if they issue the dividends. In this opinion I am fortified by the Solicitor of the Treasury.

I have not time to go into the merits of this proposition. I can only say that millions of dollars in these stock dividends are being issued for the purpose of avoiding the income tax levied on cash dividends. The tax ought to go into effect from the time I introduced the bill. If that is not done, the bill will accomplish nothing. By the time the bill goes into effect the corporations will have issued all of this kind of stock they desire.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. The gentleman just stated that in 1919 the tax had been automatically reduced—I think about 25 per cent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I think that would be about the reduction in the amount collected from the excess-profits tax in 1919 from what was collected in 1918.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. If that was reenacted into law, would not it take care of the soldier bonus?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very easily, if the income tax was also put back to the 1918 rates.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Why not reenact it into law?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I know of no reason why it should not be reenacted, when we are having so much difficulty in finding necessary revenue.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman state the date on which he introduced the bill with reference to stock dividends, so that we may know what the retroactive nature of the bill would be?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That was introduced on March 15, 1920, a short time after the Supreme Court decision.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. What reason did the committee give for not reporting out the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I shall have to decline to make any comments on the action of members of the committee. The gentleman can get their reasons by talking with them.

Mr. GARNER. I only wondered why, if the gentleman has got such a meritorious bill, it should not be reported out to the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think my friend from Texas knows just as much about it as I do. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he is in favor of taxing income on nontaxable bonds?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is a different question. My proposition would not tax securities that are now tax exempt.

Next, I would place a tax on gifts above $5,000 of 15 per cent, except when made to charitable and educational institutions. We now have no tax on gifts as such; in fact, our laws are so defective that they can be used to evade the income tax. As the law stands now, if a New York broker has made a large profit on a block of stock he can turn it over to his wife, and his wife can sell the stock and no income tax is collected on the profit derived therefrom.

Fourth, I would have an increase in the estate taxes, especially on large estates.

Fifth, I would revise the excess-profits tax so as to increase the amount paid by corporations making unreasonable profits, prevent evasion by reason of inflated capitalization, and reach more effectively profits retained by corporations in order to escape the income tax on dividends paid.

If these propositions do not soon become a part of our laws it will not be my fault. I shall work for them incessantly.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I want to call the attention of the committee to what I think is the most objectionable provision of the soldiers' adjustment of pay bill introduced in this House last Thursday. I refer to Title VI. The proposed measure is divided into six different titles. Title I contains the general provisions. Title II refers to adjusted service pay, Title III to adjusted service certificates, Title IV to vocational-training aid, Title V to farm or home aid, and Title VI to land settlement.

Each of Titles II, III, IV, and V makes some provision exclusively for the benefit of those who served in the World War either in the Army or the Navy. There are no strings tied to any of them. While Title VI purports to be for the benefit of these ex-service men, as a matter of fact it is for anybody and everybody else except these ex-service men. They are used merely to blind the real purpose of the provision. It is what is known as the Lane bill or the Mondell bill, which has been before this Congress in some shape or other for the last six years. It was one of the dreams of Secretary Lane when he became Secretary of the Interior to create a great reclamation bureau and expend millions and billions of dollars in reclaiming all kinds of waste land. It has never received a great amount of favor in this Congress. At the close of the war, and during the months of May and June, 1919, a great many bills were introduced providing for a bonus or a relief of some character to ex-service men. The first introduced among those, as I remember it, was this old Lane bill, camouflaged in the shape of a soldiers' land allotment bill; but you can take and compare the bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] with the original Lane bill, and there is no difference in principle, no difference in application or in practical working in the two, and if you will compare Title VI in this bill with the bill introduced by Mr. MONDELL you will find that it is the same old thing with a few new clothes on. I have been led to believe, and I think the majority of the Members of this House were of opinion, that this Mondell bill was as dead as a mackerel; and how it came to be rejuvenated and embodied in the bonus bill of course I do not know.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman favor legislation for the relief of the soldiers?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but I can not favor this provision.

Mr. GARNER. Why?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Because it is a mere subterfuge.

Mr. GARNER. I asked the gentleman this question for this purpose: The legion requested certain legislation——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And I thought probably the gentleman was for that legislation because they asked for it, for he has given no other reason. The legion asked for this particular legislation, and that is one of the reasons it is in this bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have been informed that they have asked for this bill, but what induced them to do it has never been made plain. There is a whole lot that might be said about the Lane bill and about the campaign that has been made for it from the time of its inception six years ago down to this time. I might recall to the attention of the committee that in the Sixty-fourth Congress $200,000 was appropriated for the purpose of preliminary investigation looking to the feasibility of this character of legislation, and it might be interesting to know that the greater portion of the $200,000 has been expended in propaganda for the purpose of popularizing this impractical and impossible scheme. But as to how much of this money has been spent in salaries to paid agents to get their indorsements I am not informed. It might be interesting at this juncture, however, to call the attention of the committee to some of this propaganda. I hold in my hand a booklet issued by the Department of the Interior under the name of the Secretary, entitled "United Reclamation Service," reading upon the outside: "Hey there, do you want a home on a farm? If so, read this, fill in the back page, tear off, and mail—no postage required." Read the contents of this booklet, and you will find that it would make Get-rich-quick Wallingford green with envy because of the glowing and great possibilities that have been pictured. It is an Elysian dream of what every one of these men might expect to wake up and find a living reality. I desire to quote from it as follows:

WORK AND HOMES FOR OUR FIGHTING MEN.

Q. What do you mean by work and homes?—A. Just this, favorable action by Congress at the special session is expected on soldiers' settlement legislation, similar to that introduced and favorably reported at the recent session. If such legislation is passed it will enable the Interior Department to begin work at once developing cooperative farm settlements for soldiers and sailors in all or nearly all of the States.

Q. Who will get the farms?—A. Those who create them by working on, draining, clearing, irrigating, and improving the lands.

Q. Will all get farms?—A. That depends on the amount of land reclaimed.

Q. Is this plan only for men who have been across?—A. No; it is for all of the men who have worn Uncle Sam's uniform in the Great War.

Q. Where is this land located?—A. In practically every State in the Union there are large areas of this land. There is dry land in the West that needs water, which can be provided by building dams and canals. In the East are large areas of cut-over or logged-off timber land, from which it will be necessary to blow the stumps and clear off the underbrush. In the South there is a large amount of cut-over land and swamp land which must be drained.

Q. Could I get a job near my old home?—A. Probably you could. These proposed settlements are scattered all over the country, and it is time to have one in each State, if Congress provides the money for construction.

Q. How about wages?—A. You will be paid fair wages by the Government while doing this work—just as good wages as you would be able to get in outside work of like character.

Q. Would I be enlisted?—A. No; this work is only for men who have been honorably discharged from the service.

Q. What kind of work is this?—A. The Government will have work of all kinds in connection with these settlements, from the highest technical and clerical positions to that of laborers.

Q. Now, how about getting a home out of this?—A. After you have helped build the dams and canals, cleared the cut-over land of stumps, or built the ditches to drain the swamp lands; after you have helped to erect houses and barns, built fences, constructed roads, and laid out town sites, built creameries, canneries, warehouses, schools; after you have, in fact, actually reclaimed the land, the Government will allow you to pick out one of these farms planted in crops.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this a propaganda for the Morgan bill or the Mondell bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This was a propaganda on the Mondell bill. To continue:

Q. Does the Government give me this farm for nothing?—A. No. And you wouldn't want the Government to do it. The plan is to arrange for you to pay for your farm home in small payments over a long term of years, with interest charges at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

Q. How about stock and farm implements?—A. It is planned that the Government will also furnish you with the necessary stock and farm implements, to be paid for by you in small payments spread over several years.

Q. Where will I get the money to make even these small payments?—A. You should be able to save the amount of the first payment out of your wages while working for the Government helping to build these settlements. The balance you should be able to pay from the proceeds from the sale of your crops.

Q. I think I should like farm life, but I don't like the idea of being too far away from other people.—A. It is the plan, if Congress passes the bill now pending before it, to build what are known as community settlements, each containing not less than 100 farmhouses surrounding a town, so that you will have near neighbors, good roads over which to bring your produce to town, and market for the sale of your produce within a short distance of your farm home.

Q. How many acres will my farm contain?—A. This will depend upon the location and kind of farming you engage in. For general farming, from 40 to 80 acres each; live stock, from 80 to 160 acres; fruit farms, 15 to 20 acres; and truck, from 5 to 20 acres.

Q. I don't know anything about farming, but would like to get a farm home. How will I learn to farm?—A. Competent instructors in farm practice will be stationed on each project to teach men like you just how to make a success of farming.

Q. You say that this plan depends on Congress passing this bill. Then, why are you asking me these questions now, before the bill is passed?—A. Because Congress has asked the Interior Department to make a preliminary investigation of possible settlements throughout the country, and also wishes to know whether, if construction of these settlements is authorized, the soldiers, sailors, and marines would be interested in securing work and homes on these settlements.

Q. Can I get any further information about the plan?—A. Yes. Fill out the post card on the last page of this booklet and mail it. It doesn't require any postage. Your name will be on file in the Interior Department, so that you can be notified later if the plan is started. It is not possible now to say when this information can be sent you, and you should, of course, in the meantime not sit idly by, but instead accept the best employment that now presents itself. You are urged on your return home to get in touch with the United States Employment Service in your locality and with your local council of defense, both of which organizations will gladly give you advice and assistance in securing employment now.

Now, fill out the post card on the back page and mail it. You don't have to put a stamp on it. Be sure and sign your name and write plainly. But remember that this means work. This is not a bounty scheme. It will give a chance to own a farm only to those who want to work a farm.

These persons are asked to fill out name in full; home address; how old are you; what was your occupation before you enlisted; have you ever worked on a farm; are you interested in this plan to provide work and a farm for you; what kind of farming do you wish to follow; state whether general, live stock, truck, or fruit; would you be willing to take a job on some project if offered to you; in your own State; anywhere in the United States; write plainly and mail to-day; no postage required.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman state that this bill carries out that project that he has read?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; that is the purpose of the bill. Now, there were 250,000——

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. How many of these replies did the Department of the Interior get back?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The Secretary of the Interior testified before the committee that they sent out 250,000 of these booklets from his office, and that they got back 48,000 of these cards of inquiry, but a little more than 1 per cent of the soldiers engaged in the war; that they received additional inquiries from other sources about 12,000 more, making 60,000 in all, or about 1½ per cent of those who were engaged in the war.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana if the fact that what militated against this Lane-Mondell bill and worked up opposition to it was not the fact that they could not find any places to be drained that would make room for one of these colonies except the Everglades of Florida and southern Louisiana?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, I think that equal opposition was worked up to it by reason of the absolute impracticability and impossibility of it, and from the fact that it is a scheme for the reclamation of arid, waste, and cut-over lands. As some one has suggested, there are thousands and thousands of miles of area in some of these Western States where there is beautiful scenery and where rock is worth about 1 cent per cubic mile. There is lots of that character of land. Now, I wish to state further to show you how absolutely impractical this thing is, that the Secretary of the Interior in his testimony before the committee having this matter in charge originally suggested in answer to a question that he had calculated that it would take about $6,000 to finish one of these projects—that is, the farm projects would cost on an average about $6,000. After I had read that testimony, in order that I might get some facts from some departments that had some experience and knew something of the practical operation of these reclamation schemes, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture asking for information upon the proposition, which I think will be very edifying to this committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, before the gentleman gets to that I want to ask him if the Morgan plan, so called, did not militate very much against the Lane-Mondell plan?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, there is not any doubt about that; and the fact is that the Morgan plan has some very attractive features about it, one of which is to create a revolving fund, as I understand it, of about $100,000,000 for the purpose of loaning money to the men who are desiring to purchase homes of their own choice—real, existing propositions of their own selection, in their own State, among their kinsmen and friends. I am told by men who have some knowledge and have had much experience in these reclamation projects, if this thing were commenced to-day we could not get one of these reclamation projects so it would be fit for occupancy within less than 10 or 15 years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not the feature of the Morgan plan to loan money to soldiers at a low rate of interest, so that they can buy a farm wherever they want to, the thing that popularizes the idea which Mr. Morgan suggests? The farm the soldier would get out in the gentleman's country or mine would, of course, be small, on account of the high price of land, but everybody does not want to go to the West.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. That is one of the most objectionable features of this scheme, even if it were practicable—to have to go away from their home, to have to go away from the place of their birth, from their associations, from their environments. These men, if we are going to do anything for them, ought to have some choice in respect to their home, and not be forced to these strange and uninviting places.

But this very bill, as you will see if you will take and read it carefully, has in mind the creation and the establishment in perpetuity of a bureau of reclamation here; and the outlay is beyond the calculation of men. I think I will be able to show you before I get through with what I have to say that, instead of its costing $300,000,000, as proposed by the bill, it would cost, if it was carried out as proposed in this measure, more than $10,000,000,000. It provides for a board of four directors or commissioners, who are to act in conjunction with the Secretary of the Interior, at a salary of $7,500 each, to continue in office for a period of five years. And I wish at this juncture to call attention to this provision, which absolutely shows that it is not the purpose of this measure to benefit the soldier boy.

You can take the 250,000 of these cards that were sent out, and the propaganda that has been spread in every possible way, upon the rostrum, through the public press, and otherwise, and yet the returns from all those, with all that energy expended, has brought back less than 1½ per cent from the men who are interested in this legislation. And they have jumped to the conclusion that each one who has answered one of these cards is going to take one of these projects. And you will find further that it was contemplated from the inquiries that were received that at least 640,000 ex-service men would take advantage of the scheme. If that was carried out, basing your calculation upon what the Secretary of the Interior has said, that it would take to complete one of these projects $6,000, it amounts to $3,340,000,000. However, it would take more than three times that amount, or about $10,000,000,000. But here is the joker in this proposition: After going on and providing and making all of the provisions for its creation and operation, here is what it says:

> Any unit not allotted to a veteran or repatriate within one year after the public notice in respect thereto, as provided by this section, may be disposed of to qualified citizens under the provisions of the reclamation laws.

That absolutely establishes, if you please, that this reclamation measure is not for the benefit of the soldier, who is expecting any relief Congress is going to give him within a year or two years at most. If they carry out this dream and if they ever have any of these projects ready and there should be no soldiers who wanted them, under the provisions of this law they could sell them to anybody who might take them.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I wish to say that the provision to which the gentleman makes reference was put in by the clerks in the drafting bureau and did not receive much consideration in the committee, and there is no objection to eliminating it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Who authorized this bureau you talk about to put anything in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I understand that this bill was turned over to these expert draftsmen to fix up, and they thought it would be a good idea to have it in there, and the committee did not go into any detail and did not approve it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is like the fellows who used to write a copy of the Bible. They would write a note on the edge and the next copyist would copy the note into the Bible.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is the desire of those advocating these reclamation projects that the soldiers shall have the entire benefit of this land.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose they do not want it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Eventually, if they do not want it, the land would be open to anybody who would take it.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The gentleman has told us how this propaganda was carried on for the soldiers, but he did not tell us how the American Legion came to get behind this bill in its recommendations.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I presume that was largely psychological. The American Legion was probably exercising its judgment as to the best plan possible to pursue. They knew this was the pet and the dream of the Secretary of the Interior. They knew that some gentlemen in this House were very enthusiastic about it, and I expect that they thought by putting this measure in that they would at least avoid a certain amount of opposition. That is a mere conjecture, but we have a right to draw our conclusions from all the circumstances.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Are not the numerous defects which have been pointed out by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] the reason now that this bill is known as the "Lane-Mondell bill"?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know. Now, permit me to proceed.

After reading these hearings for the purpose of getting the information that I alluded to a while ago, I addressed the letter to the Secretary of Agriculture for such facts as he could present concerning the cost of this reclamation proposition, and under date of July 24 he replied as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
> Washington, July 24, 1919.
> Hon. WILL R. WOOD,
> House of Representatives.
> DEAR MR. WOOD: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of June 23, requesting that you be informed of the results of any investigation that may have been made by the Department of Agriculture as to the cost of reclaiming lands and placing them in condition to be farmed, together with the cost of improvements to enable practical farming.
> In regard to the reclamation of desert land, the cost of such reclamation may be divided into two parts, namely, providing a water supply and the improvement of the farm units. The first of these consists of such items as the building of a storage dam, diversion dam, main and lateral canals, and head gates, chutes, drops, flumes, siphons, etc., including whatever works are necessary to bring the irrigation water to the individual tracts to be reclaimed. The cost of such works at present depends entirely upon the physical conditions encountered and varies from a minimum of probably $50 per acre to a maximum which has not been determined. Projects recently surveyed have indicated a cost of $160 per acre. There are considerable areas of desert lands in the West which are physically reclaimable, but which can not be economically reclaimed at the present time because the crop returns from such land would not justify the cost of reclamation. This economic limit obviously varies with different soils, climatic conditions, and distance from markets. It would be feasible to spend considerably more in reclaiming land having a rich soil and a long growing season than land at a high altitude having a very short growing season.

Under the second group is included clearing and leveling the land, building farm ditches and ditch structures, plowing, fencing, domestic water supply, necessary farm buildings, farm implements, live stock, etc. The average cost of preparing land for irrigation—that is, clearing, leveling, and ditching, based on data secured several years ago—varied from $9 in Wyoming to $19 in California. At that time some rather fragmentary data on the cost of equipping an irrigated farm, where general farming was followed, showed that this varied from $17 to $32 per acre. These figures would have to be very materially increased in order to make them applicable to present conditions.

There remains to be reclaimed in the United States approximately 100,000,000 acres of swamp, wet, and overflowed lands. These may be divided into four general classes, (1) swamp lands, (2) tidal marshes, (3) lands that are too wet for cultivation at certain seasons of the year or are periodically overflowed, and (4) seeped irrigated lands. The cost of reclaiming these lands is determined by the following factors: The cost of the unimproved land; the cost of drainage; the cost of clearing and preparing for cultivation; the cost of necessary buildings and fences; interest on investment during the period of development; and any incidental expenses, such as for lime or commercial fertilizers where they may be needed.

The character of the timber determines largely the cost of clearing. The farmer clearing the land usually does not try to bring it under cultivation immediately, but cuts out the undergrowth and small trees and girdles the larger trees. The stumps and deadened trees are removed as they rot out; in the meantime the land may be either cultivated or used as pasture. Generally the labor on the farm is utilized for clearing land at such times as there is not much other work to be done. This method of clearing is slow, and the trees and stumps interfere with cultivation, but the amount of labor required is comparatively small. If it is desired to place the land under cultivation immediately after the timber is removed, the stumps either are grubbed out by hand or are removed with explosives or mechanical stump pullers, or a combination of the methods used. The number, size, kind, and condition of the stumps are the principal factors in determining the cost.

If it is desired to clear stumps from the land immediately after the timber is cut, this item generally will be the largest in the cost of reclamation. If the process can be made more gradual, the cost is materially reduced, but the stumps and trees remaining on the land interfere with farming operations. The cost of clearing is probably the most uncertain item entering into the cost of reclamation, and there is little data available in regard to the cost of clearing large tracts. It appears probable that if large tracts are to be cleared at one time, an organization could be built up and methods developed that would materially reduce the cost. Large projects of this character would also be in a better position to utilize the by-products from the work.

Clearing new heavy hardwood stumps from land in the lower Mississippi Valley has cost from $60 to more than $150 per acre, and will probably average $80 to $90 per acre. Clearing stumps from pine lands such as are found on the coastal plain region of the South can be done more cheaply, usually for $15 to $50 per acre, as the stumps can be burned. In Idaho it has cost from $75 to $125 per acre or more to clear land; in northern Minnesota it has cost from $100 to $125 per acre; in the Pacific coast regions the cost sometimes has been above $200 per acre; while in Canada clearing stumps from land that was heavily timbered has cost, in some instances, more than $400 per acre. These figures are at prewar prices for labor and materials; if more efficient methods can not be used, the costs now would be much greater. However, in most clearing operations there is considerable salvage in the form of cordwood, poles, posts, logs, and other lumber. In some places these can be sold, or the farmer can utilize them, and thus the cost of clearing is reduced.

Recently engineers of this department have worked out rough estimates of the cost of reclamation for a number of projects in different parts of the country. The idea was to present not the cheapest project that might be found, but one that would be representative of a number of projects in each region under discussion. The costs of clearing used in these estimates have not been increased greatly over prewar prices, as it is thought that the saving from more extensive use of machinery, better organization, and more complete utilization of salvage will approximately offset the increases in prices for labor and supplies. Land prices are increasing rapidly in certain sections at present. The lands are expected to be developed in units of 5,000 acres or more, as topography or economic conditions may require. It is estimated that farms of 160 acres now will cost approximately as follows, for purchase of land, drainage, clearing, buildings, farm machinery, work animals, and some fencing, ready for cultivation:

Black lands of eastern Carolinas and southeastern Virginia—$65 to $115 per acre, average about $90 per acre, if cleared by burning; $100 to $200 per acre, average about $150, if cleared by pulling, grubbing, or blasting stumps.

Coastal Plain region of South Atlantic States—$95 to $155 per acre, average $125 per acre.

Wet prairie lands of southern Louisiana—$85 to $140 per acre, average $110.

Gulf coast of Texas between Orange and Bay City—$85 to $145 per acre, average $115 per acre. Areas that require drainage by pumping will average about $30 per acre more.

Northeastern Louisiana, eastern Arkansas, southeastern Missouri, and Yazoo Delta in Mississippi—$110 to $200 per acre, average about $150.

Grand River Valley in northwestern Missouri—an area of approximately 60,000 acres can be reclaimed for $150 to $225 per acre, average about $185.

Western Iowa, 40,000 acres—$225 to $300 per acre, average about $260.

Northern Minnesota, northern Michigan, and northern Wisconsin—$120 to $200 per acre, average $160.

San Luis Valley, Colo.—$125 to $150 per acre, average $140.

Very truly, yours,

C. F. MARVIN, Acting Secretary.

These figures speak for themselves. They are not mine. They come from a coordinate branch of this Government whose business it is to furnish the Congress, or Members thereof, the facts. They were deducted from actual experience and experimentation by the Department of Agriculture in prewar times.

If the figures I have submitted represent the cost of reclamation during that period, you can multiply them by two or three and get the result as to what the cost would be now.

Remember that the Secretary of the Interior, in his hearings before the committee, testified that these projects would each cost on an average of $6,000. I have taken the pains to make some calculations based upon the average figures submitted by the Secretary of the Interior, and which I have just given to you.

I think it will be admitted that 160 acres is an average tract for farm purposes in any section of our country where agricultural pursuits are followed. Taking this as a unit, a tract of this size in the eastern Carolinas and southeastern Virginia would cost $14,400. Farms of this character for the 600,000 that it is proposed to take care of under this legislation would cost $8,640,000,000.

The same farm, if cleared by pulling, grubbing, or blasting stumps, would cost $150 an acre, or $24,000 per farm, or $12,400,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in the Coastal Plain region of the South Atlantic States, at $125 an acre, would cost $20,000, and 600,000 farms would cost $12,000,000,000.

A farm in the wet prairie land of southern Louisiana, at $110 an acre, would cost $17,600, or $10,560,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in the Gulf coast of Texas, at $115 per acre, would cost, $18,400, or $11,040,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in the Gulf region of Texas, where pumping is required, at $145 per acre, would cost $23,200, or $13,920,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in the northeast coast of Louisiana, eastern Arkansas, southeastern Missouri, Yazoo Delta of the Mississippi, at $150 per acre, would cost $24,000, or $14,400,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in the Grand River Valley of northwest Missouri, at $185 an acre, where it is estimated that there are 60,000 acres in a tract, would cost $29,600, or $17,760,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in western Iowa, where there is a 40,000-acre tract, at $260 per acre, would cost $41,600, or $24,960,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in northern Minnesota, northern Michigan, or northern Wisconsin, where there are cut-over lands, at $160 an acre, would cost $25,600, or $15,360,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

A farm in the San Luis Valley of Colorado, at $140 an acre, would cost $22,400, or $14,400,000,000 for 600,000 farms.

The average cost of the 11 proposals just referred to is $148.50 per acre. A 160-acre farm at this average would cost $23,760, and 600,000 farms would cost $14,256,000,000.

Bear in mind that these estimates are made upon the cost of labor and material in each instance at prewar figures.

The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, has estimated that these projects, 600,000 of them, if completed according to the plans set forth by him in his testimony and in the propaganda that has been sent broadcast over this country at the expense of the Government, would not exceed $4,000,000,000. He bases his calculation, however, upon his estimate that these projects would not cost more than $6,000 each. I do not believe there is a fair-minded man or set of men who have no interest in any of these projects but what would conclude in a moment that he has shot far under the mark and that the estimates submitted by the Secretary of Agriculture are far more dependable.

In view of past experience it is my judgment if we venture upon this scheme and carry it to the conclusion desired by the proponents of this measure, it would come nearer costing $40,000,000,000 than it would $4,000,000,000.

All this talk about 600,000 ex-soldiers availing themselves of the opportunity of taking such projects is preposterous, and, in my mind, if the propagandist who has been going around over this country extolling the beauties of this scheme and the great benefits that would flow to the possessors of each project therefrom had given the facts instead of painting the Fabian picture that he did there would not have been a single resolution passed by a single legion post anywhere in the country in favor of item 6 of this measure.

The whole thing should be stricken out. The bill will be complete without it. Item 5 provides a splendid home-buying scheme and, if it is not sufficient, the addition of the Morgan proposition to create a revolving fund of $100,000,000 to loan to ex-service men with which to acquire or build their homes would answer, in a practical way, all that is desired or could be hoped for by these men. This would permit them to choose their own home site and not compel them to go into these unforbidden wastes to eke out a mere existence.

I have felt it my duty to set forth the facts in my possession, coming as they have from an unprejudiced source—the Department of Agriculture—in order that the ex-service men of the country might be fully apprised of what they had been baited with and what a snare and delusion the whole scheme is. If I have succeeded in doing this, I will feel that the time required in gathering these facts has been well expended. Not only will it save them from disappointment but, if this item is stricken from this bill, as it should be, it will save the Public Treasury in expenditure billions and billions of dollars. [Applause.]

The time having expired, by unanimous consent Mr. WOOD of Indiana was granted consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would not take up the time of the House even for a moment to reply to the statements made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] and those who agree with him—those very few who agree with him—if it were not for the fact that entirely erroneous, misleading, and inaccurate statements have been reiterated time and time again by a few gentlemen who seem to have taken a very peculiar dislike to a sound and sane constructive piece of legislation, the so-called soldier-settlement legislation, now article 6 of the soldier bill introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

I claim no special credit for the bill which the gentleman has just attacked. It simply nationalizes a policy the wisdom and success of which have been abundantly demonstrated on many projects under the national reclamation law in the West in the last few years.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the minority leader, the other day called attention to the fact that notwithstanding the tremendous growth and development of this country practically every rural section of the country was either scarcely holding its own or was actually decreasing in population. Our people are drifting to the towns, and unless this tendency is checked we will soon be a Nation of city dwellers. Who is to grow the foodstuffs of the Nation in the days to come in the face of that situation? And where are we to find the farm-grown boys and girls that have been the national hope and standby not only of this Nation but of every other nation in the world since time began to run?

The so-called Lane plan needs no defense at my hands or at the hands of anyone. The only reason why I refer to it is for fear that some unthinking people, in view of the talk and clamor of a small and noisy minority, might come to the conclusion that there were a considerable number of people who were opposed to it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I regret I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Gentlemen have been insistent that we consider legislation for the soldier; and some of them, the noisiest of them, have been insisting that they are anxious to do just what the soldiers have asked us to do. If that is really their desire, why do they persist in jeopardizing all soldier legislation by arguing against the one feature the soldiers have most indorsed? The soldier-settlement plan is the one feature of soldier legislation that from the beginning up to this good hour has been indorsed and approved by every legion post that has considered it, by every State organization that has taken the matter up, by the national meetings of the legion, and that was written by the official representatives of the legion in extenso and in detail into the bill they presented to the Committee on Ways and Means of this House. In the face of those facts gentlemen who claim they want to do just what the soldiers want to have done rise in protest against this feature of the fourfold legion plan, which is the one feature that, without regard to differences relative to other plans or other features of plans, has received the indorsement of practically every post and every organization of ex-soldiers and every committee of the legion that has presented soldier legislation to the committees of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No, I can not; I have not the time. With some gentlemen it seems to be a question of securing the opportunity of slapping every man back of the ex-service men on the back and telling him, "I did something for you; I got you a bonus," and any legislation that does not enable gentlemen to do that particular thing, whether what is proposed would be helpful or not, does not appear to be popular with a certain class of gentlemen. The soldier-settlement plan will help no one except those who are willing to help themselves. Fortunately there are many such among the ex-soldiers.

Let us remember this: Whether or not you think it wise and just and proper to grant a cash bonus to the men of the services, whether or not you consider it wise and just and helpful to enable these men to secure vocational training, whether or not you deem it wise and well to provide them with paid-up insurance policies, whether or not you hold it to be wise and in their interest and in the interest of the country to encourage ex-service men to buy homes, this is true and can not be successfully controverted, that the one provision in the bill presented by the legion, and the one provision presented in the bill approved by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, which is a national investment rather than a donation, which is perennially constructive, and which will, in the running of the years, beyond all question redound to the benefit and advantage of the men who avail themselves of its opportunities and aid in the upbuilding of the Nation, is this soldier-settlement provision which certain gentlemen take it upon themselves to constantly assail and misrepresent.

If the experience we have had under the national reclamation law shall be duplicated in Massachusetts and in the Carolinas, in Maine and Indiana, Georgia and Ohio, as it has been in the West under a like plan, under this law we shall restore to highly beneficial use waste places that are now useless and valueless, we shall establish many thousands of happy, prosperous homes in ideal communities, and we shall do it without the ultimate loss of a single dollar of the public money. The investment, if we have the same experience that we had in the West under the reclamation law, will all be returned to the Treasury. Outside of any question of soldier aid or benefit, this plan should appeal to every forward-looking, right-thinking citizen of the Republic. There has not been a nation in history that at some time did not feel called upon to turn its attention to the encouragement of rural home building, of country development.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have one minute more?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's time is not up, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman has one minute more.

Mr. MONDELL. In our wonderful development as a Nation we passed by fair and fertile areas simply because in their natural state they were not suitable for habitation and needed reclamation and restoration. With the rapid opening and development of the western lands, less fertile lands in New England and in the Central States and within sight of the dome of this Capitol have been allowed to go back to a condition of nature. No finer, no more inspiring work, no more hopeful opportunity, no more necessary task lies before the Nation than by well-directed object lessons to prove how and whereby these regions may be restored to use and fertility and made to provide homes for our people and yield their wealth to the Nation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I expect to use the time allotted me in the discussion of one of the topics discussed yesterday by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], and in doing so I am glad to take my stand with him.

It seems to me that we have no graver responsibility than to use such wisdom as we may possess in dealing with the bonus proposition contained in the bill introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FORDNEY]. During the present Congress that measure has not had, nor will it have, any parallel in importance, whether considered independently or as a precedent for future legislation. I can not support it, or any similar measure, but I am reluctant to oppose it without a frank statement of the reasons controlling my action. In stating these reasons I shall forget party differences and personal considerations and speak simply as an American who may be unable, but is at least anxious, to assist in a proper disposition of a most serious matter.

The bill provides what is described as adjusted compensation to the men who served in the war. This is, of course, to be provided without regard to race or color, or as to whether the service was confined to the United States or rendered abroad, or as to who of those who went abroad were exposed and who were not exposed to the storm of battle. Nor is any regard had to individual financial status or need. The bill contemplates the payment of a cash sum, at the rate of $1.25 per day for the period of service specified, to every one of about 3,600,000 men, and it carries alternative plans that are assumed to be equivalent to the cash plan. The average cash payment will amount to about $500, and the total cash payment to about $1,800,000,000. There has been controversy, and will be further controversy, as to how this vast sum should be raised. But there is no question that resort must be had to taxation, and there can be no question, however the tax is laid, that finally the burden will largely fall on the mass of the people who are consumers of the necessaries of life. Under the particular bill I am now discussing not much less than $1,000,000,000 of the total amount would be directly drawn from the consumers by taxation of sales. And from the mass of the people much of the residue would be finally exacted. It is idle to talk of the Government increasing its debt or its tax levies without, as a result, an increase of prices and the cost of living, and a further depression of the market value of the outstanding bonds. Those bonds are held by millions of the people, who, in buying them, performed a patriotic service, and expected their market value would not fall below par. That they are already sharply depressed is one of the unfortunate features of the existing situation.

No one can fairly contend that the so-called adjusted compensation is compensation in full, or, in any true sense, compensation at all. There is no method of arithmetic for expressing the value of patriotism in money, and if that were possible no treasury would be rich enough to meet the liability. [Applause.] It is not compensation, but a present money donation. The legislation can not operate as an acquittance to bar like appropriations. No assurance is or can be given that like appropriations will not hereafter be from time to time suggested and made. If this step is taken, an unlimited mortgage is placed upon the future, and that might as well be understood now. Should we embark on this policy, which will apply to all other wars in which the country may be engaged, we may say farewell to the possibility of the Government finding money for work that we had hoped it might after a while undertake, as, for illustration, a more extensive participation in the educational work of the country, and a system of better national highways, than which hardly anything is more essential in the estimation of many of the constituencies represented here.

Let me repeat what others have said as to the entire country and every agency of the Government being committed to a most liberal policy toward the men disabled by wounds and disease and the dependents of those who have died. We are all prepared to go as far in that direction as may be needed or required. It is estimated that the total expenditure for that purpose in the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1921, will be more than $458,000,000. If that proves insufficient, the total will certainly be increased, and if the expenditure for that year seems inadequate it will certainly be enlarged in the years to follow. On this point there should be no doubt or misgiving. Equally there can be no doubt or misgiving of what the Government's attitude will hereafter be toward those now unimpaired as their health and strength may decline. An attitude of generosity is absolutely assured by the treatment the Government has accorded the veterans of former wars.

The bonus proposition is not based upon disability or any obligation to widows or orphans. The beneficiaries are the men who, we are thankful to say, emerged from the war unscathed and most of them probably more vigorous and capable in body and in mind than when they entered the service. Their equipment for the business of life is therefore more complete. Aside from that, they are the masters of a splendid possession. From them can never be taken their record of devotion to the cause of their country and civilization, which was untinged by fear and marked by every heroic quality of self-sacrifice that men have ever displayed. [Applause.] In the springtime of life they have won fame that will last while they are here and that will not fade as the generations come and go, for it is as the radiance of an unsetting sun.

The record of these young men makes a powerful appeal to our pride. It makes the same appeal as the record of the young soldiers who fought in the Revolution through six years of extreme danger and hardship, as the record of a later generation of young soldiers who fought through four years in the desperate struggle that divided this country. It is not possible that in any manner whatever we can compensate them for the service they have rendered. We can no more do that than could our predecessors have compensated the men who followed Washington or the men who followed Grant and Sherman, or those who, having followed Lee and Jackson, laid down their arms at Appomattox.

The measure does not raise a party issue, nor does it raise a sectional issue. But, as a Virginian, I pause a moment to reflect upon the experience of the men of my own State who wore the Confederate uniform, for I would gladly trust them to decide this matter and abide by their opinion. And they had full experience. They were at every disadvantage. Such payment as they received during the war was in a currency that was constantly depreciating. They were so poorly clad as to be unprotected from the storms and cold of winter. They were so poorly fed as to be almost in a state of starvation. Nevertheless they maintained their fortitude to the end. When the end came they returned to theirs homes—such homes as remained—with courage unshaken, resolutely facing the future, with no dependence except upon their own exertions, and unassisted they rebuilt their land and their institutions, not asking a dollar from any government. [Applause.] At least 160,000 Virginians were in the Confederate service, of whom several thousand still survive, and all pension payments on every account that have been made to all of them by their impoverished State in the period of more than half a century from 1865 to 1920 amount to the comparatively trifling sum of $10,000,000. No young man or middle-aged man received a dollar, no man unless disabled or without means. I will not believe that the Virginia survivors of the Civil War will find any reason for giving this measure their sanction. Nor will I believe that the sons and grandsons of the Virginians who won imperishable knighthood in that war will, when they have taken into view every aspect of this matter, deliberately signify their approval of it. [Applause.]

There is nothing that can be done by legislation in the way of furnishing employment for the ex-service men which I will not cooperate in doing. There is nothing within the province of legislation in the way of further affording them the opportunity for education from which I will withhold my support if it is separately proposed. Education and employment are desirable and helpful. But I will not vote for a cash bonus, and the fundamental reason for refusing to do so is because of my firm opinion, considering it from the point of view of the men themselves, that it is distinctly undesirable that it would be not only not helpful but actually harmful. It would make against personal initiative and self-reliance. It would encourage dependence on the Government, dependence by one class on all other classes in the community, who would, of course, bear the burden of the contribution for the benefit of the favored class.

Few of us here were born to position or fortune. We have had to make our own way, and we are able to bear testimony to that as being the best training and the surest avenue to success. I will not take a step calculated to subject the ex-service men to a reversal of that valuable process. Those who ask for the bonus must believe that those of us who oppose it hold to the profound conviction that it would have a bad influence instead of a good influence upon their future, and that we shall act accordingly, and we are satisfied that a large body of the soldiers will indorse our action.

The effect of the proposed legislation upon the business of the country I will not discuss beyond citing what has been said on the floor of the House within the last few days by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and one of the leaders of its majority, Mr. GOOD, of Iowa, who speaks with authority because he is compelled to take a comprehensive view of the entire situation as it now exists. He called attention to the highly unsatisfactory labor situation and outlined a condition that is illustrated by the deplorable shortage of farm labor, which is just as acute in the district I have the privilege of representing as elsewhere. It is a condition that threatens the continued sufficient production of the necessaries of life, and involves not only the prosperity of the agricultural interests, but the very existence of the social fabric and the permanence of orderly government. He pointed to the inevitable effect of doing something which would amount to persuading many young men to withdraw for the time from their usual occupations, and in that connection he made particular reference to the "500,000 colored men who entered the war." It is stated that about 180,000 of the colored soldiers were overseas and 35,000 actually under fire. If Mr. GOOD's figures are correct, then under this bill the payment to the class he describes will exceed $200,000,000. Addressing himself to those of us on this side of the aisle, Mr. GOOD said:

> You are complaining now because men are not taking up the regular vocations of life and there is an underproduction. I ask you in all seriousness what effect the payment of such a bonus will have on production. What will you say when you turn over, the next day after you pass the bonus bill, $500 to every one of these soldiers who served in that war and witness the withdrawal of this class of labor, so sorely needed, from active participation in the productive walks of life? Are we to act blindly now, and after the damage is done consider the results of ill-advised legislation? Let us seriously consider first and act afterwards.

Furthermore, there is a point I submit to the calm judgment of any of the ex-service men who may be urging the passage of this bill. They have done their full part, but others of their countrymen have also, in a less conspicuous manner, tried to do their part. A cash payment to one group can not be made without discriminating against other groups. I do not refer to those civilians, few in number as compared with the mass of the people, who profited by the war, some of whom can not be charged with dishonesty, but some of whom, because of their conscienceless conduct in which not a few of them still persist, deserve execration. I am now referring to the men and women who toiled unceasingly in the quiet places, on the farms and in the fields, on the cattle ranges and in the lumber camps, exerting themselves to the utmost to aid in winning the war by producing the commodities necessary for use in this country and for use abroad by our Army and our allies. Many of them, worn by service, are in no better condition financially, many are poorer, than when the war began. I refer to the laborers of the country who toiled in their numberless pursuits, sparing no effort to bring the war to a victorious conclusion, many of whom, having accumulated nothing, find themselves in worse position financially now than they were before. I refer to helpless people of small incomes, widows and children many of them, who, as a direct result of the war, are unable to live upon the resources which might have been sufficient before the war occurred. I refer to the employees in the civil service of the Government, now very numerous, because ours is the greatest of all governments in its varied operations, who have not obtained any financial advantage and who are poorer, since their salaries, even with such additions as have been made, are not equal in purchasing power to the salaries they once received. I might refer to other classes, as for instance, to the teachers in the public schools, who sacrificed their pecuniary interests in standing by the work of education; to the physicians and nurses who strove night and day to do their own work and the work of those who had entered the service; to the draft officials in every city, town, and county who gave themselves freely and unremittingly to the common cause. And what of the civilians who went to Europe at the call of the Government—for example, the men and the women connected with the welfare organizations who will long be remembered as having held high the ensigns of religion and mercy alongside the flag of their country? [Applause.] No one can deny that millions of men and women who did their part will be subjected to a clear discrimination if this measure should become a law, a discrimination to which I will not believe the service men, upon sober reflection, will lend their indorsement. The bill excludes the possibility of the money being raised by a tax on excess profits. Even though the liability should thus be placed, nevertheless there would still be a clear discrimination, inasmuch as the fund produced would be distributed to one class and all other classes wholly excluded. Further tax incomes and excess profits as you will, but turn the revenue into the General Treasury for the relief of all the people. [Applause.]

The thing as proposed can not be done at all without in the main passing the tax to the consumers of the country, all of whom will pay in the execution of this plan higher prices for the necessaries of life. The other day I heard some one remark here that a sales tax is rather unimportant to the consumer. But we know from common experience that such a tax is always multiplied before it reaches the consumer; and in these days it will be multiplied to the limit. The farmer who buys an agricultural implement, the housewife who buys a supply of groceries, will pay the sales tax, which will be increased, before it is paid, according to the dictates of cupidity or convenience. This tax the bill calls a "victory tax."

There is frequent allusion in the House to the enormous public debt that has been incurred and the load of taxation that the people are now carrying. The fact has a seriousness that can not be exaggerated. We are constantly impressed with the importance of lessening the tax burdens and economizing in expenditures. But, if this measure should be adopted, no Member of this House, whether leader or follower, should ever stand here again and advocate economy and a reduction of taxes. The leader of the majority will be estopped to do so, and the estoppel will apply to all of us on both sides. We will have become unable to claim that we are earnest and consistent champions of a policy of economy and reduction. We will only be able to feebly claim that we are for such a policy when it happens to be along the line of little resistance.

I have spoken of the measure as extraordinary and as fixing a dangerous precedent. From the foundation of the Government up to June 30, 1916, the total expenditures of the Government in pension payments amounted to a little over $5,000,000,000, and now we are proposing in connection with a war of short duration just over to provide for a payment at one stroke of not much, if any, less than $2,000,000,000 in addition to all that has been appropriated and all that must be appropriated for the benefit of the men who were disabled and the dependents of those who have passed away.

I see nothing in the measure to commend it and I can not give it my support. Believing it to be against the best interests of the public—the entire public, including primarily the ex-service man—if I were to support the measure to gain some personal advantage, or keep silent for that purpose, I would be false to every promise made to the generous people whose commission I bear—I would be nothing more than a political profiteer. Many a soldier friend of mine would regard me as a mere political profiteer. There is but one course for me to pursue. It is said by some that such a course will be detrimental to those who take it. I do not think so. But if I am mistaken in that opinion I am ready to accept the consequences of my action. If I should leave here because of my position on this matter, I would go with regret but carry with me the satisfaction of having done my duty as I see it. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. I yield 34 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just left the floor [Mr. MOORE of Virginia] shows that he is a student, that he comprehends cause and effect, and in my judgment has a clear grasp of the national problem, and possesses the courage to speak his convictions. [Applause.] His discussion was along a line upon which I had been making some study. However, the thing I have been trying to get at is whether the cost of Government, which is now very high, is a permanent cost level from which we can not come down. We are constantly required here to make additions to the Government cost on the basis of meeting this high cost level. It comes from many, many different angles. If we assume that this cost level is permanent, then I am quite certain that it will be inevitably necessary for the various increases that have been asked to be granted.

The cost of government has been so disturbing to the country generally that it becomes the subject of discussion in the municipality and in the State as well as here in Congress. In order to get at the facts, I addressed a series of questions to the mayors of the leading cities of America, and also to the governors of all the States. I asked them six questions, telling them in my letter that I hoped they would be perfectly frank to reply with the understanding that I would want to use their replies or at least their conclusions before Congress.

One question was:

Is your budget on the increase, and to what extent?

The reply to that invariably is in the affirmative, and the increases run from 25 per cent, some of them, up beyond 100 per cent, quite a number 60 per cent.

The next question was:

Give your causes of increase, and state whether it can be avoided?

Nearly all, if not all, say that the increase can not be avoided; that the causes usually are in the increase of salaries, the increase of wages, and very frequently in the increase of departments of government and of agencies. Some of the cities, for example, have added to their municipalities in the way of park systems and other improvements.

The next question was:

How do you meet the added increase?

The answer is, almost universally, by increased taxation.

The next question was:

Are the results of increased cost justifiable in your opinion?

Most of them say they are and can not be avoided. A few of them state that they are not; that is, that they might reduce some of the governmental agencies. They do not any of them say that the increase of salary is not justifiable, but that some of the governmental agencies might be reduced.

The next question was:

What steps, if any, can be taken to reduce the cost of government?

The mayor of Denver, for example, replies:

None by the city government.

Quite a number reply that steps may be taken in a better system of budgeting and also by a reduction of governmental agencies, and especially by a concentration of governmental agencies. For example, the city of Chicago reports that there are 22 individual agencies of government found in that city, and they are trying to centralize them. In that case there would be doubtless quite a saving.

My next question was:

What suggestion would you make on the question of Federal taxation?

The mayor of Denver says:

Too deep for us.

I have quite a variety of opinions, however, from various mayors and governors.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to read one or two letters just as a sample of the replies. Here is a letter from the mayor of Louisville, Ky. It is quite informing and good enough to print:

LOUISVILLE, KY., April 20, 1920.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have received your communication of April 15 and answer it as follows:

(1) Question. Is your budget on the increase and to what extent?

Answer. The budget of the city of Louisville for the year 1920 as compared with the year 1915 has increased 25 per cent, exclusive of schools. Including large increases to schools, the total budget has increased during that time 27 per cent.

(2) Question. Give causes of increase and state whether it can be avoided?

Answer. The increase has been caused most of all by increase of wages, and, secondarily, by the increase of cost of material. During the last five years there has been no extraordinary work to influence the budget. No way to avoid increase, except to lower wages, which will also lower cost of material.

(3) Question. How do you meet the added burden?

Answer. The added burden of the 25 per cent increase on the budget has been met by a 25 per cent increase in revenue, which has been produced by reasonable increases in assessments and increases in tax rate. Nearly all the increase in the tax rate was caused by allowing more money to the schools. We also partially met the burden by abolishing useless offices and by requiring office men to work longer—that is, eight hours a day, including lunch time.

(4) Question. Are the results of increased cost justifiable in your opinion?

Answer. I do not thoroughly understand this question, but I will say this, that the increase of wages has merely enabled the city to retain efficient men. They have not been made more efficient by the increase. The increase of the cost of material has necessarily prevented as much constructive work. Therefore the city of Louisville has less to show for the expenditure of this money than it would have had if the increased cost had not occurred. Some few head men, whose pay was not increased, became more efficient themselves, and more closely checked up the work of subordinates. In other words, the organization as a whole became more efficient.

(5) Question. What steps, if any, can be taken to reduce the cost of government?

Answer. The city of Louisville in some of its departments actually increased numerically the number of its men and also actually increased numerically modern equipment, but in other departments numerically decreased the number of men and abolished some subordinate departments where organizations had been maintained to do occasional work, but which work, when it arises, can easily be taken over by some other department. I therefore suggest the following for the Federal Government:

(a) Have a survey made of the pay rolls of all the Government departments. I am sure you will find thousands of jobs that may be dispensed with.

(b) The city of Louisville has for many years operated under a strict budget system, and it is unlawful for contracts to be made in any one year exceeding the appropriations for that year, and each department must live within its income. The result is we make ends meet because we have to. The budget should be made up under the supervision of the executive in the initial stages and should be planned by very few men. My practice has been to require the comptroller to make up a tentative budget based upon past years' expenditures; then, after personally seeing that the police and fire departments are amply cared for, I have a few important heads of some of the departments look over the budget, and then call a larger meeting of the various branches of the city government to openly state their needs and back it up with statements, which are usually submitted to the executive before any of these meetings are called. It is sad to contemplate that governments are far behind in business methods, because there is more anxiety to place favorites in business positions than to require those favorites to have business qualifications.

I rather favor a Republican administration, putting Republicans in responsible places, but I insist on those Republicans being competent men. What I say of a Republican administration is true of a Democratic administration.

(c) Since I have been in office employees are paid once a week and purchases are promptly paid for before the 10th of each month, thus obtaining discounts in many instances and better prices perhaps in all instances. It stands to reason that better prices may be obtained if people are paid promptly. Dealings with the United States Government are generally tedious and long drawn out. I am sure that a properly organized budget system, that will assure people dealing with it of justice and prompt payment, will enable it to make better purchases and better contracts.

6. Question. What suggestions would you make on Federal taxation?

Answer: This is a tremendous question and I will limit myself to a few observations, which I think are of basic importance and if properly adjusted will go a long way toward relieving the burden of the Government and of the whole country; and in doing this I am keeping in mind psychology and what appeals to the heart as right:

(a) The income tax comes closer to my sense of right than any tax that I know of. The ordinary conception is that a man should pay according to his ability. There are the necessaries of life and some small comforts that are common to us all. No tax should be based upon so much of a man's income as is necessary to purchase these things. If this rule is violated, there is a sense of wrong and embryonic unrest. After a man has purchased the necessary things and the small comforts, anything else he purchases is in the nature of a luxury. The strong should help the weak and should help keep the weak contented, which in the end is a benefit to the strong. Therefore, I think the present exempted income is too small and larger sums should be paid by those in proportion to their ability.

There is also a direct saving to the Government by pursuing this method. When a vast group of little men are taken in, a great sum of money must be spent for clerk hire and material.

(b) I do not think there is any excuse now for the excess-profit tax. It encourages large salaries, waste, and leaves the manufacturer and owner of the business in uncertainty. He usually makes sure he is not going to lose anything and adds all he can to the price of his commodity before it reaches the consumer, who, if he happens to be a laboring man, begins to cry for more wages, which has been and will be a constant source of agitation until we make up our minds we will do those things that will allow natural economic laws to operate.

(c) In my opinion the greatest factor in the present disturbance was the enactment of the Adamson law and the enormous pay rolls in the railroad that followed. The standard was set so high that all classes of men have been struggling toward that abnormally high standard. I see much hope in the Esch-Cummins law.

(d) I also gravely fear that under the Federal reserve banking act we have Bill Bryan's 50-cent dollar in disguise. This last observation may seem foreign to the subject, but I do not think so, for the Government measures its costs in dollars, and as its dollars buy less than they ought to, its expenses are higher.

I have done the best I can to answer your questions without writing a treatise.

Yours, truly, GEO. WUSSINGER SMITH, Mayor.

The answer of the Louisville mayor is not different from the general answers of mayors of other cities of the country. I desire to read the answer of the governor of my own State:

STATE OF OHIO,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Columbus, May 3, 1920.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of the 21st, and take pleasure in responding to your inquiries.

1. Our budget is on the increase.

2. The addition has been occasioned by the increased cost of food and other necessities in the conduct of our correctional institutions and asylums; at the same time, simple justice has compelled increases in compensation to the State employees.

3. Ohio, notwithstanding the increased cost of governmental expense, has invoked no new method of taxation nor has it added to the tax rate. Three things have made it possible in the face of this situation to keep our fiscal affairs on a stable base:

a. During the years of 1913 and 1914 we purchased large tracts of ground adjacent to our State institutions upon the theory that many of the State charges most of the time are able, physically and mentally, to perform labor, and outdoor employment has not only been the means of working out improvement in the health of the patients but of yielding very definite, practical results to the State.

b. The budget system established in 1913 has enabled us to make tremendous savings.

c. The industrial growth of the State has given us substantial increases in our receipts under the statutes which carry excise taxation.

4. The increased cost is occasioned in the main through the period of inflation through which we are passing. Demand has exceeded supply in all lines, and until conditions wrought by readjustment bring the supply appreciably nearer demand high costs will doubtless obtain.

5. The cost of Federal Government can be diminished very much, it seems to me, by establishing a budget system. I served on the Committee on Appropriations in Congress and was always impressed with the great waste, most of which can be avoided by a modern budget. Another thing essential, as I see it at least, in reducing the cost of National Government, is to bring to an end many activities occasioned by the emergency of the war. These are not only costly, but I sometimes believe they promote a restless feeling among our people. Besides that, unless it is all brought to an end, then we are departing from the historic tradition that has been helpful in the past in preserving the rights of the States.

6. First of all, I think that the excess-profits tax should be abolished at the earliest date possible, and that it should be succeeded by a tax on volume of business of from 1 to 1½ per cent. Furthermore, so soon as the fiscal conditions of government would permit the inheritance tax should be given up; it can only be justified as a national affair by the exigencies of war. Its establishment in the outset was upon the theory that property is transferred from one generation to another by governmental agencies, all of which occasioned an expense, and which in common-sense fairness would seem to demand a compensation. The service rendered, however, is by the State and the county; the National Government is not helpful; therefore when a cost is imposed the revenues should be divided between the State and the local subdivision of government.

With all good wishes, I am,
Very truly, yours, JAMES M. COX.

One of the most informing letters I have received from the governors is from Gov. Gardner, of Missouri, which also includes answers to 25 questions that he had submitted to as many governors. Mr. Chairman, it contains so much information that I will ask unanimous consent to insert Gov. Gardner's letter in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert a letter from Gov. Gardner in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. The membership of the House will be interested in reading the answers to Gov. Gardner's questions, and they will find a splendid fund of information on the question of taxation in the States:

SUMMARIES OF DATA RELATING TO STATE REVENUES FOR 1920 AS RECEIVED BY GOV. GARDNER FROM GOVERNORS OF 25 STATES.

The matter contained in the summaries has been gathered from the following questions:

1. How much do you estimate the budget of your State to be for the year 1920, not including such items as road funds, interest and sinking fund to pay bonds, but simply to cover operating expenses, such as the State's contribution to education, courts' administration, penal and eleemosynary institutions, etc.? In Missouri this is called a general revenue fund.

2. What do you estimate your population and what is your per capita?

3. What is the assessed value of real and personal property in your State to actual full money value?

4. What is the rate for State purposes?

5. What source of revenue have you found to replace the revenue formerly received from the liquor traffic?

6. What means are you taking to cope with the low purchasing power of the dollar to meet salaries, supplies, etc.?

7. Do you find complaint because, besides Federal, you have a State income tax?

8. What are the principal and most satisfactory sources of revenue in your State?

9. General remarks.

1. How much do you estimate the budget of your State to be for the year 1920, not including such items as road funds, interest and sinking fund to pay bonds, but simply to cover operating expenses, such as the State's contribution to education, courts' administration, penal and eleemosynary institutions, etc.? In Missouri this is called a general revenue fund.

Alabama: Budget of appropriations for 1920, not including funds and interest on debt, $9,155,000.

Arizona: Appropriations for the fiscal year, July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920:

State maintenance	$541, 695. 00
Military	62, 000. 00
Educational (not including institution)	1, 220, 483. 71
Institutional maintenance	1, 001, 457. 50
Institutional building and improvement	744, 887. 56
	3, 570, 523. 77

California: Budget for expenses for the State, according to the classification given, will amount for the current fiscal year to $23,637,993. Our regular appropriations are based on two-year expenses because our legislature meets biennially, but the above is a segregation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Colorado: About $2,336,000, which includes everything except items mentioned by you. All of our educational institutions and some of the reformatory and eleemosynary institutions have separate mill levies and are not counted under general revenues.

Connecticut: The appropriations made by the 1919 general assembly for the expenses of the State for the two years ending June 30, 1921, aggregate $20,825,488.50.

Florida: Not answered.

Indiana: Our estimates are as follows:

General fund, institutions and departments	$7, 000, 000
Educational institution fund tax	1, 550, 000
Vocational education fund tax	210, 000
School revenue tuition by State	5, 750, 000
	12, 510, 000

Kansas: All State expenditures are payable from the general revenue fund. For the fiscal year 1920 the legislature made appropriations as follows:

For educational institutions	$2, 870, 892. 78
Charitable institutions	1, 213, 833. 77
Penal institutions	827, 386. 90
Patriotic institutions	316, 740. 51
Printing	249, 310. 65
Schoolbook commission	35, 000. 00
Miscellaneous	49, 112. 49
Executive departments	163, 789. 61
Judicial department	251, 241. 66
Legislative department	43, 553. 22
Fuel and freight for institutions	175, 084. 58
Other departments, boards, commissions, etc	1, 546, 391. 79
	7, 742, 337. 96

To meet these appropriations the legislature authorized a levy for State tax purposes of $6,500,000, but the officers charged with making the levy thought it unnecessary to raise so much and levied only $6,049,650. The remainder of the appropriations for the year will be cared for by receipts from miscellaneous sources, chiefly those coming through the insurance department, inheritance taxes, etc.

Maine: Total budget estimate for 1920, corresponding to the Missouri general revenue fund, is $7,573,032.13.

Minnesota: The appropriations by the 1919 legislature for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, from the revenue fund total $15,361,058.

This covers expenses of all administrative and judicial departments, all charitable and correctional institutions under State control, and all normal schools. The State university gets $1,865,000 for maintenance for the current year from the above fund and also the proceeds of two tax levies, one of 32 mills for a building program and one of 23 mills for general maintenance. The State high, graded, and rural schools also receive the proceeds of a 1 mill State tax levy.

Missouri: Budget, approximately $9,125,000, which was amount expended for 1919, including expenses for public schools. Estimated expenditures for 1920 will be about same.

Montana: Total amount of general fund appropriations which became effective March 1, 1920, is $2,945,895.76. This amount does not include balances, either debit or credit, carried over from the previous fiscal period, but may, for the purposes of the inquiry, be regarded as the 1920–21 budget.

New Hampshire: The fiscal year of the State ends August 31, 1920, for which—

The legislature made a total appropriation of		$2, 460, 183. 02
Deducting the following items mentioned:
Interest	$79, 826. 48
Bonds	85, 000. 00
Highway	125, 000. 00
Highway	250, 000. 00
		539, 826. 48
Leaves the amount for expenses		1, 920, 356. 54

Ohio: Budget, $24,000,000 for fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Oregon: Approximately $4,500,000, although this is purely estimated. This may be greatly enlarged if bills to be voted on at a special election in May are enacted into laws.

Pennsylvania: $53,000,000. Owing to the increased cost of everything our institutions and departments will probably show a deficit of $3,000,000, but our revenues will be sufficient to give us a surplus of fully $3,000,000, and perhaps, $4,000,000, for the year.

Rhode Island: Total revenue for 1919 was $5,321,722.43, of which $477,223.25 was received from auto licenses and required by law to be expended on highways.

South Carolina: Approximately $5,614,411.78.

South Dakota: Approximately $2,500,000 for fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Texas: Money appropriated for the fiscal year, beginning September 1, 1919, and ending August 31, 1920:

Educational	$6, 171, 861
Eleemosynary	2, 746, 604
Judicial department	1, 468, 288
Departments	2, 286, 702
All other expenses	3, 405, 050
	16, 078, 505

Utah: Approximately $4,500,000.

Vermont: Estimate of budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, $2,500,000. This does not include special appropriations, but simply operating expenses. (This amount does not include funds for the support of the fish and game department, which derives its revenue from hunting and fishing licenses.)

Washington: The estimated annual expenditures for 1920 from general fund is $5,280,500.21.

West Virginia: For the year ending June 30, 1920, the appropriations for general purposes are as follows:

Repairs and improvements	$231, 000
Buildings and land	470, 000
Department of public safety (State police)	225, 000
Other purposes	2, 895, 440
	3, 821, 440

There is also appropriated out of the State's general school fund for the maintenance of the State school department and aid to local school districts $750,000. The above totals do not include appropriations for roads and interest and sinking funds.

Wisconsin: Budget approximately $16,000,000.

2. What do you estimate your population and what is your per capita?

Alabama: Estimated population, 3,000,000; revenue per capita, $3.50.

Arizona: Estimated population, 300,000; revenue per capita, $17.10.

California: Population, about 3,125,000; revenue per capita, $7.57.

Colorado: Population, 1,000,000; revenue per capita, about $2.33.

Connecticut: Population, about 1,400,000; revenue per capita, $7.43.

Florida: Not answered.

Indiana: Estimated population, 1920, 3,000,000; per capita revenue, $4.17, and State poll tax, $1.

Kansas: The last domestic census, taken in 1919, gave a population of 1,759,793. Per capita revenue, $3.43. The total taxes for all purposes in the State levied that year was $55,613,475 and the per capita tax for all purposes—that is, for State, county, city, township, school district, and all other—was $31.60.

Maine: Population, approximately, 785,000. The direct-tax commitment for 1920 is $4,188,344.76. This would give a per capita tax of $5.33 plus. To this should be added the poll tax on male citizens, which is $2 in most cases, but in some towns is $3.

Minnesota: The estimated population is 2,250,000. The railroad gross earnings taxes approximate $7,500,000 and inheritance, insurance, and other miscellaneous taxes about $2,800,000, leaving about $5,000,000 to be raised for the revenue fund by direct taxation. The total direct taxes raised for State purposes are $14,400,743. Compilations by the State auditor show the total taxes levied in the State for county purposes this year to be $20,456,171; for city purposes, $27,452,630; for township purposes, $8,255,351; for school districts, $26,373,508, making the total tax levies in the State $96,938,405.

Missouri: Estimated population, 3,500,000; per capita revenue, $2.65.

Montana: Estimated population, 750,000; per capita revenue, $3.92.

New Hampshire: Estimated population, 440,000; per capita revenue, $4.31.

Ohio: Population, 5,000,000; per capita revenue, $4.80.

Oregon: Not answered.

Pennsylvania: Population about 9,000,000; revenue per capita, $5.88.

Rhode Island: Estimated population, 654,510; revenue per capita, $8.12.

South Carolina: Population about 2,000,000; revenue per capita, $2.80.

South Dakota: Estimated population, 640,000; revenue per capita, $3.90.

Texas: Population, 4,687,136; revenue per capita, $3.44.

Utah: Estimated population, about 500,000; revenue per capita, $9.

Vermont: Estimated population, 350,000. Per capita revenue, $7.

Washington: Estimated population, 1,600,000. Per capita revenue, $3.30.

West Virginia: Estimated population, 1,475,000. On the basis of the appropriations, as shown by answer 1, the per capita is $2.59, exclusive of the appropriation out of the general school fund. The appropriation from the general school fund is equivalent to 50 cents, making a grand total of $3.09.

Wisconsin: Estimated population, 2,800,000. Per capita revenue, $5.07.

3. What is the assessed value of real and personal property in your State to actual full money value?

Alabama: The statute places taxable value at 60 per cent of reasonable cash value of property assessed for taxation. The assessed value of taxable property in the State for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1918, and ending September 30, 1919, was $725,000,000, approximately. This amount is supposed to represent 60 per cent of the reasonable cash value of the property included in the assessment. Considering both personalty and realty the assessed value does not in all probability represent more than 35 per cent of actual value of property assessed. The exemptions in this State are considerable. The greatest is the 40 per cent exemption of property liable for assessment. Other exemptions are all solvent credits, improvements of the water-power companies, shipbuilding plants, nitrate plants, manufactured articles manufactured within the year, agricultural products grown during the current or preceding year, besides minor exemptions to individual taxpayers, which in the aggregate are considerable.

Arizona: $855,224,720.

California: The assessed value of real and personal property in our State is placed by the State board of equalization at $4,023,009,588, and the ratio of assessment to real value is about 45 per cent.

Colorado: $1,495,000,000.

Connecticut: Supposed to be market value.

Florida: Not answered.

Indiana: Assessed valuation of real and personal property, $5,780,480,039. Property is assessed at 100 cents on each dollar.

Kansas: Personal property that gets upon the assessment roll is assessed at practically actual value. City real estate and improvements are also assessed well up toward actual value—perhaps in the aggregate 10 per cent below. Rural real estate is not assessed so high—probably 70 to 85 per cent of actual value.

Maine: The next valuation of property in Maine will be returned the latter part of 1920. The last valuation was in 1918, and the taxes for 1919 and 1920 were committed on the valuation of 1918. This is, estimating property at a fair market value, as follows:

Real estate in cities, towns, and plantations	$389,987,250
Personal estate in cities, towns, and plantations	125,531,712
Real estate in unorganized plantations	59,953,719
Growth on public lots (grass and timber)	1,969,848
	577,442,529

Minnesota: The taxable valuation in the State is $1,774,607,364. The law requires that all property be "listed" at true and full value and "assessed" at different valuations—from 25 to 50 per cent of true value.

Missouri: Thirty-three and one-third to forty per cent.

Montana: No figures can be given at this time for the assessed valuation of the property of the State as of date March 1, 1920; nor, because of certain adjustments, is it feasible to attempt to quote exact figures for the 1919 assessment. The State board of equalization submits the following estimates of the 1919 figures, from which 1920 will probably not vary widely: Gross valuation for 1919, $1,693,000,000; adjusted values for taxation, $530,000,000. The gross valuation given above is believed to represent approximately 68 per cent of the true market value. On this basis, the worth of the entire State is, in round numbers, $2,489,700,000.

New Hampshire: One hundred per cent.

Ohio: Two-thirds of real value.

Oregon: Assessments are supposed to be on basis of true cash valuation. Ratios in various counties as estimated by State tax commission run from 50 to 90 per cent.

Pennsylvania: About $14,000,000,000. There is no State tax on real or personal property.

Rhode Island: Averages 75 to 80 per cent.

South Carolina: Assessed value, $402,859,947; actual value (estimated), $1,208,579,841.

South Dakota: The laws require that all property be assessed at full value. Estimated present ratio of assessed value to full value, approximately 80 per cent.

Texas: Assessed valuation of State in 1919, $3,100,000,000. Actual money value (estimated), $12,000,000,000.

Utah: The statutes provide that property shall be assessed at full cash value; the assessed valuation for 1919 was $692,000,000, which is estimated by the board of equalization to represent about 75 per cent of the actual cash value.

Vermont: The assessed valuation of real estate, $185,700,799.60. Personal property, $69,631,661.09.

Washington: The assessed value of real and personal property is $1,060,620,838. Full value of all property, $2,535,504,949.

West Virginia: The 1919 assessed value of property is:

Real estate	$767,653,310
Personal property	372,631,062
Public-utility property	349,550,461
	1,489,834,833

Property is presumed to be assessed at its true and actual value. However, the total assessed value probably is not over 60 per cent of the true and actual value.

Wisconsin: $4,068,268,534.

4. What is the rate for State purposes?

Alabama: The rate for State purposes is 6½ mills on the dollar, divided as follows, according to the constitution: Three mills for public schools, 3½ mills for the general fund. Of the latter, 1 mill, by statute, has been set aside for Confederate pensions.

Arizona: Sixty cents on each $100 of taxable property.

California: We have no ad valorem taxes in California. Some years ago the whole tax system was changed to a percentage tax on gross earnings and receipts of public utilities and other corporations which is expressed in various rates, as follows:

	Per cent.
Railroad gross earnings	5.25
Car companies	3.95
Express companies	.009
Telephone and telegraph companies	4.2
Gas and electric companies	5.6

Colorado: 2.37 mills, which includes educational institutions and some of others.

Connecticut: State tax aggregated $1,350,000 for 9 months of 1919 (the fiscal year was changed to end June 30, instead of September 30), which is apportioned among the towns.

Florida: The State tax rate for 1919 was 12 mills, divided as follows:

	Mills.
General revenue	5
State school tax	1
Pension tax	3½
State board health tax	½
State road tax	2
State prison farm	½

Indiana: Total State rate for the year 1920, 18 cents on each $100.

Kansas: The rate of levy for State tax purposes in 1919 was 1.75 mills. The average rate of levy in the State for all purposes in 1919 was 16.1155 mills.

Maine: For 1920, 7¼ mills, of which one-quarter mill is especially assessed to provide funds for aiding dependents of men in the Federal service during the World War.

Minnesota: "Money and credits" are listed at full value and taxed at a flat rate of 3 mills. The taxes received are divided, one-sixth to the State revenue fund; one-sixth to the county; one-third to the city, village, or township; and one-third to the school district. The assessed value of money and credits for the current year is $359,112,619.

Missouri: Fifteen cents, general revenue; 3 cents, capitol bonds; total, 18 cents.

Montana: The tax rate for the State purposes is 2½ mills; total yield of the 1919 assessment to the general fund of the State should be $1,325,000.

New Hampshire: No rate established. A definite sum fixed by the legislature, which is apportioned among the towns in the proportion that the valuation of each town bears to the total valuation of all towns.

Ohio:

Highway levy	$0.5
Sinking fund levy	.0025
University levy	.0925
School levy	.055
Total	.65

Oregon: Four and forty-three one-hundredths mills. Millage no longer used as basis in Oregon.

Pennsylvania: No State tax on realty or personalty for State purposes. The revenues come from taxes on the capital stock of certain corporations, on earnings of these, from various fees and licenses, and from inheritances. Revenues have increased about $20,000,000 in the past two years by making the tax laws more uniform and by enforcing them more thoroughly without adding any new sources of taxation.

Rhode Island: Twelve cents on each $100 of local assessed valuation of real and personal property.

South Carolina: Twelve mills.

South Dakota: For ordinary State purposes, 1.7 mills for the year 1919.

Texas: The total tax rate for 1919 is 75 cents on the $100 assessed valuation, as follows: State school fund, 35 cents; State general expenses, 35 cents; Confederate pensions, 5 cents.

Utah: Five mills, divided—2.4 general fund, of which 28 per cent goes to the University of Utah and Utah Agricultural College; 2.4 school purposes; .2 high schools.

Vermont: Tax rate for State purposes, 1916, 5 cents on the dollar of the grand list; 1917, 20 cents; 1918, 20 cents; 1919, 40 cents; 1920, 40 cents. This does not include highway tax of 5 cents on the dollar of the grand list, nor school tax of 10 cents on the dollar of the grand list.

Washington: Tax rate for general State purposes, 4.58. This included tax levy for institutions of higher learning, 1.58.

West Virginia: The present rate for general State purposes is 4 cents on each $100 of assessed value. Ten cents for Virginia debt fund.

Wisconsin: Only tax for general State purposes is a nominal tax of $100.

1919 taxes, collected in 1920.

Purpose.	Rate.	Amount.
Interest on certificates of indebtedness	$0.000048996622	$199,331.42

Highways	.00041786819	1,700,000.00
Soldier bonus	.003902364045	15,875,864.85

5. What sources of revenue have you found to replace the revenue formerly received from the liquor traffic?

Alabama: The State revenue from the liquor traffic has never been a great deal; that is to say, the revenue derived from this source for use of the general fund of the State has not been an important item for a number of years. However, the amount lost through this source has been recovered largely through licensing of other businesses.

Arizona: The State never received any revenue from the liquor traffic. Licenses and fines went to schools in the district where located, and the various school funds have been taken care of by special district levy.

California: This State has never received revenue as a State from the liquor traffic and has made no effort to compensate for the change due to the eighteenth amendment.

Colorado: Not any; but our mill levy has increased but very little since prohibition went into effect.

Connecticut: The amount received in 1919 from liquor licenses was $324,235.28. This, of course, will be nothing for 1920. There is as yet no specific tax to meet the deficiency. The 1921 general assembly may make some provision.

Florida: Not advised of any special source of revenue that has been found to replace the revenue formerly received from the liquor traffic. This loss of revenue, as well as that received from the hire of convicts, which has also been stopped, is covered by the tax rate above mentioned.

Indiana: None. However, we make great savings in courts and in penal institutions.

Kansas: In Kansas the liquor traffic has not been a source of revenue for more than a quarter of a century. No particular source of revenue was provided to replace the loss of revenue from the liquor traffic. The burden of public expense, shared partially by the earlier receipts from the liquor traffic, was, of course, shifted to general property. Kansas has the general property tax.

Maine: Maine has had prohibition for over 50 years. The only revenue the liquor traffic has provided in that time has been through fines imposed by the courts.

Minnesota: The State never received revenue from the liquor traffic, except a 2 per cent tax on license fees paid to municipalities used for a State home for inebriates.

Missouri: Tax on income, inheritance tax, corporation and franchise tax. Missouri formerly received 20 per cent of her revenue from revenue of liquor traffic.

Montana: Not answered.

New Hampshire: The State never had any income from liquor traffic licenses. Money was divided to counties and towns.

Ohio: Direct inheritance tax is the principal revenue.

Oregon: The State never received revenue from liquor traffic. Licenses were always imposed by cities, towns, or counties.

Pennsylvania: Haven't needed any. State received only a small share of liquor-license revenue. Cities and countries will miss it, but we are profiting through the amazing reduction in the number of criminals and derelicts due to prohibition.

Rhode Island: None.

South Carolina: Not any new source. It has been replaced by increased taxes on taxable property.

South Dakota: Have no revenue for State purposes from liquor traffic. Before prohibition went into effect in this State a license was paid by persons operating saloons, which was a source of revenue to the local taxing district and the county general fund.

Texas: We have a gross receipts tax of 1½ per cent on all oil production, which will produce between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 this year.

Utah: The State has never derived any revenue from the liquor traffic other than usual general property tax which amounted to but little.

Vermont: No source of revenue has been found to replace revenue formerly received from the liquor traffic.

Washington: Have found no special source of revenue to replace liquor traffic.

West Virginia: West Virginia has had prohibition since July 1, 1914. The annual revenue received from liquor license was, approximately, $600,000. The 1915 legislature provided for new revenue by increasing the charter tax rates on corporations and by providing for a tax of one-half of 1 per cent on the net income of corporations. These two acts more than offset the loss from liquor revenue.

Wisconsin: State has not received any funds from this source.

6. What means are you taking to cope with the low purchasing power of the dollar to meet salaries, supplies, etc.?

Alabama: The legislature of 1919 enacted laws providing for taxation of incomes, and from that source will largely come the needed revenue. However, a tax on the right to mine minerals was also placed on the books. From this latter source considerable revenue should be forthcoming. The business license schedules were somewhat increased, and the taxing machinery was adjusted in so far as possible to meet the new conditions.

Arizona: The legislature considered existing economic conditions in making last appropriations but did not anticipate any further increases; consequently some hardship is found in running institutions without creating deficiencies.

California: The increase in the gross receipts of the various utilities and corporations from which the State gets its income has naturally increased the return made to the State, and this is sufficient for present needs and has kept California in good shape financially. The board of control has strenuously fought every inclination to be infected by the general orgies of wastefulness, and by improvement in management of institutions and cutting out every unnecessary expense, with close cooperation of our buying department and increased production in all our institutions, has been able to prevent any serious effect from the present financial condition.

Colorado: That is the matter now being brought forcibly to the front.

Connecticut: So far only the receipt from various sources, as will appear from receipts by the State treasurer.

Florida: The legislature of 1920 made a slight increase in the salaries of the different employees, but the salaries of the officials were not changed.

Indiana: By a more rigid practice of economy and speeding up production in State institutions.

Kansas: No special efforts have been made by the legislature to offset the decreasing purchase power of the dollar, except that the legislature of 1919 raised public salaries to a considerable extent.

Maine: Additional appropriations by the legislature have, of course, been necessary because of the shrinking value of the dollar. In addition to these, personal attention to the affairs of all departments, with the closest cooperation by department heads, has resulted in a great elimination of waste formerly prevalent. The saving in this way has helped to meet added expenditures.

Salaries of all grades have been increased, but a careful attention to the actual needs of a department has resulted in better work without the necessity of adding additional clerks at a greatly increased outlay.

Minnesota: The legislature of 1919 made increased appropriations for educational, charitable, and correctional institutions and for a large number of State departments. In spite of this, it has been necessary for institutions to exercise most rigid economy and in some cases to get along with reduced fare and inadequate help.

Missouri: Revenues have not increased as they should. We are having considerable difficulty. The three new revenue measures above mentioned are yielding most of our revenue at the present time and are proving quite satisfactory. It is possible that the next legislature may readjust salaries in this State.

Montana: Not answered.

New Hampshire: Increase of State tax, and at constitutional convention held in January the convention voted to submit to the people the recommendation that the constitution be amended to enable the legislature to enact an income-tax law for increasing revenue.

Ohio: All salaries of employees receiving under $2,400 per year raised. All incumbents of positions requiring technical training receiving over $2,400 per year raised. Minimum building activity.

Oregon: Increasing salaries moderately and practicing economy.

Pennsylvania: Collecting our taxes more thoroughly and effecting economies in administration.

Rhode Island: None.

South Carolina: With few exceptions salaries have not been raised, and increased cost of supplies, materials, and equipment has been met by increasing the rate. (The work of our tax commission in equalizing has increased the assessed valuation, but the object of this was for equalization only.)

South Dakota: Not answered.

Texas: By increased appropriation in some instances, but struggling along and hoping for better conditions generally.

Utah: We have granted moderate increases in salaries where funds were available, but the advances have been very limited, and I believe our salaries are below the average paid by corporations, etc.

Vermont: The State board of control has exerted itself to use funds wisely and at the same time to maintain State institutions without reducing the high standard of care for inmates. It can be said that the increased cost for operating various State institutions has not exceeded 30 per cent.

Washington: Special session of the legislature is convening March 22 to take care of extraordinary deficit in higher educational institutions.

West Virginia: The legislature, which met in the early part of 1919, attempted to provide for the condition caused by the low purchasing power of the dollar by making more liberal appropriations. It also passed the new revenue act providing for a special privilege tax for the transportation of oil and gas by the means of pipe lines.

Wisconsin: We are endeavoring to be as economical as possible in the use of both service and supplies. While the expenses of the State have increased, there have been corresponding increases in State revenues.

Building operations are curtailed as much as possible.

7. Do you find complaint because, besides Federal, you have a State income tax?

Alabama: We find no complaint from an organized source which assigns the fact of existence of the Federal income tax as a reason for objection to the State income tax. Complaint is, of course, made by individuals against the State income tax, but the same attitude will be found among all taxpayers, whether of the ad valorem class, license class, or otherwise. There is being made at this time an effort on the part of some taxpayers to have the State income-tax law declared unconstitutional.

Arizona: Arizona has no State income tax.

California: We have no State income tax.

Colorado: We have no State income tax, only inheritance taxes.

Connecticut: We have no individual income tax. We have a tax on corporations.

Florida: There is no income tax provided for or levied under the laws of this State.

Indiana: We do not have a State income tax.

Kansas: Kansas has no State income tax.

Maine: Maine has not yet adopted an income tax.

Minnesota: Minnesota has no State income tax.

Missouri: There is some complaint in this State.

Oregon: This State has no State income tax.

Ohio: No State income tax.

Montana: Not answered.

New Hampshire: At present we have no income tax.

Pennsylvania: We have no State income tax or other direct tax, except upon inheritances.

Rhode Island: We have no State income tax.

South Carolina: We do not have a State income tax.

South Dakota: We do not have a State income tax. We have general property tax system, ad valorem basis.

Texas: We have no State income tax.

Utah: We have no State income tax; only inheritance tax.

Vermont: The State has no income tax, and therefore no complaint along this line.

Washington: We have no State income tax.

West Virginia: This State has no income tax, but has a special-privilege tax, which is based on the net income of corporations. The present rate is three-fourths of 1 per cent on the amount of net income.

Wisconsin: Some complaint, although people are gradually becoming accustomed to the same.

8. What are the principal and most satisfactory sources of revenue in your State?

Alabama: The sources of revenue are given in order of importance—1, ad valorem; 2, licenses; 3, convict department; 4, insurance department; 5, franchise taxes; 6, revenue from minor sources.

Arizona: All but a small part of the revenue of Arizona is raised by the State levy. Receipts from other than taxation are about $360,000 annually.

California: Our present revenue system has proven satisfactory, though until we learned of the increased income of our public-service corporations we feared we would lack sufficient means for the immediate future; but as we have explained under No. 6, we have not only gotten through, but find ourselves fairly on easy street if we persist in holding down expenses.

Colorado: Flat tax on corporations, insurance department, and inheritance taxes.

Connecticut: Chief sources of revenue are inheritance, corporation and railroad, and direct State tax. Each of these four sources yields from one and a half to two million dollars.

Florida: Not answered.

Indiana: General taxation and fees.

Kansas: The principal source of revenue is, of course, the general property tax. Aside from that all other sources of revenue which can be derived are, of course, satisfactory in that they tend to decrease the burden on general property. However, comparatively a small part of the total public expense is met by receipts from miscellaneous sources.

Maine: Corporation tax, which amounts to $2,589,743.80.

Minnesota: Two principal sources are railroad gross-earnings tax and direct-property tax.

Pursuant to the provision of law, I, State auditor, hereby certify that the rate of taxation required to raise the amount necessary for defraying the various State expenses for the ensuing year is .00682 mills, as provided by the following laws, to wit:

Purpose:	Rate.
State revenue fund	$0.0035
Soldiers' relief fund	.0001
Soldiers' bonus fund	.00175
State road and bridge fund	.001
Historical society building fund	.00001
Itasca State park fund	.00001
National Guard armories fund	.00003
State board of relief fund	.00005
University buildings fund	.00032
Forest fires relief fund	.00005
Total	.00682
Teachers' insurance and retirement fund levy	.00005
State school and university tax levy	.00123

Missouri: The most satisfactory source of revenue is tax on tangible property. As mentioned above, has never been quite satisfactory.

Montana: Not answered.

New Hampshire: State tax, legacy tax, tax on public-service corporations, insurance companies' tax, automobile licenses.

Ohio: Franchise and excise tax on corporations.

Oregon: Direct taxes, inheritance taxes, corporation license fees, and fees exacted from insurance companies. The heaviest source of revenue aside from direct taxes is the automobile license tax, all receipts from which, however, go into the highway fund.

Pennsylvania: Taxes on corporations, taxes on incomes, fees for various activities.

Rhode Island: Tax on savings deposits, corporate excess tax on corporations, direct State tax.

South Carolina: The principal source of revenue is tax on tangible property. Less than one-sixth of our annual revenue is derived from other sources.

South Dakota: General property tax on the following classes of property: Real estate, personal property, money and credits, telephone companies, railroad companies, express companies, sleeping-car companies, telegraph companies, private car line companies. Mortgage registry tax, inheritance taxes, interest and income from school funds.

Texas: Ad valorem and gross receipts taxes.

Utah: Principal sources of revenue for 1919 were:

Property tax	$3,871,908
Inheritance tax	329,000
State fees	340,000
Interest on State funds	40,000

Vermont: The principal source of revenue in the State is revenue received from corporations, including railroad, express, and insurance companies.

Washington: Not answered.

West Virginia: The estimated sources of revenue for the State's fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, are:

4-cent State levy	$560,000
State license tax on charters of corporations	790,000
Collateral inheritance taxes	225,000
Tax on insurance and certificates	240,000
Tax on net income of corporations	600,000
Privilege tax for the transportation of gas and oil	1,250,000
Fees	101,500
Other sources	24,500
	3,791,000

Wisconsin: Railroad taxes, insurance company taxes, inheritance taxes, licenses, and examining fees.

9. General remarks.

Alabama: Not answered.

Arizona: Not answered.

California: We have covered the points quite fully and can add nothing for general remarks further than to confess to an experience during the two years ending June 30, 1919, a biennium period that covered our war experience. The budget for this period was prepared in the fall of 1916, and from the standpoint of the market of that day was considered adequate. In the spring of 1917 the legislature, in passing this budget, recognized that prices were rising, and placed under the control of the budget board a fund of $1,000,000 for emergency need. Our record of the period is that while buying costs increased in the average about 85 per cent and on two separate occasions we made nearly horizontal increases of 10 per cent each time in wages of hospital employees, we pulled through the biennium with additions from our emergency fund of less than 14 per cent of the moneys normally available for the maintenance of the State institutions.

Colorado: We are this year attempting to inaugurate the budget system, but it will be necessary to reorganize and consolidate boards, as Illinois has done, and perhaps hold a constitutional convention before this can be effectively done.

Connecticut: The appropriations, as per copy in special laws, are what may be termed our budget. It is much larger than formerly to cover increased cost of living in our State institutions and to cover increased salaries, etc.

Florida: Not answered.

Indiana: Our State revenues have increased for the following reasons: General increase in amount of fees collected, caused by the increase in the volume of business; speeding up industries in State institutions; procuring new contracts for products manufactured by State institutions, obtaining advantage of present-day prices; greater efforts in collection of taxes.

Kansas: The clause of the constitution which requires a uniform rate of assessment and taxation on the ad valorem plan and the laws made in accordance therewith have resulted in a tax system which is far from equitable, but can not be changed until the constitution is amended so as to give the legislature freedom to classify property for taxation and to establish differential rates among the classes of property according to their different economic characteristics and values. When such a change is made in the constitution a better and far more equitable tax system can be provided. An amendment to the constitution is pending, and will be passed upon by the electorate at the coming fall election.

Maine: Money received from automobile registrations and licenses is specifically set aside for highway purposes and is not available for general use. It is also interesting to note that because of the careful preparation of the budget, although it was an informal one in both 1917 and 1919, there has been no need to take advantage of the constitutional provision for a temporary loan. No money has been borrowed in over three years, except when bonds have been issued for war and road purposes. All general administration expenses, as well as expenses arising out of war emergency but not directly connected with the war, have been met from the ordinary revenue. This has been possible because of the State contingent fund, which is derived from unexpended appropriation of a previous year.

Minnesota: Not answered.

Missouri: Not answered.

Montana: Not answered.

New Hampshire: Not answered.

Ohio: Not answered.

South Carolina: A legislative committee is now working on our tax system, and it is hoped that next year revised revenue laws will be put into effect. Something must be done to meet the increased demands for larger appropriations for governmental activities, especially the educational and correctional institutions.

West Virginia: West Virginia publishes annually an audit of the State's finances. This audit shows the exact standing of the State's finances and estimates the condition for the two ensuing years. The audit shows in detail all expenditures made by the State. Every two years the governor transmits to the legislature a budget showing the requirements for the next two years, together with a comparison of the former years; also showing the condition of the State's finances and revenues.

No State should be without a system that will show the true and actual standing of the State's finances at all times. In order to do this it is not necessary to have a complicated system, but one that can be easily understood by anyone desiring to inform himself.

One thing that is very misleading in State finances is the cash condition of the treasury. Often large amounts of revenue are collected in advance or at the beginning of the fiscal year. This revenue is to be used for a 12-month period, hence the State may have a very healthy cash balance and yet at the same time have an actual deficit. A proper accounting system will do much toward avoiding complications in State finances.

REPORT FROM MASSACHUSETTS RECEIVED AFTER COMPILING REPORTS FROM OTHER STATES.

1. How much do you estimate the budget of your State for the year of 1920 to be, not including such items as road funds, interest, and sinking fund to pay bonds, but simply to cover operating expenses, such as the State's contribution to education, courts' administration, penal and eleemosynary institutions, etc.? In Missouri this is called a general-revenue fund.

Answer. The preliminary budget provides for $32,883,801.03, covering all departments of the government. This sum does not include sinking funds, serial bonds or notes, interest, etc., nor additional expenses for special objects or estimates for expenses which may be incurred by the present legislature.

2. What do you estimate your population, and what is your per capita tax?

Answer. The population of Massachusetts is 3,700,000, approximately. Using the taxes assessed by local assessors as the basis, the per capita tax would be $30.90.

3. What is the assessed value of real and personal property in your State to actual full money value?

Answer. The assessed value of real and personal property is required by law to be the full and fair cash value—that is, the market value—and it is believed that the various boards of assessors value property very nearly at actual money value.

4. What is the rate for State purposes?

Answer. There is no general rate for State purposes. The State tax is assessed upon the basis of polls and estates, and the proportion which each city and town pays differs according to the valuation of property therein.

5. What sources of revenue have you found to replace the revenue formerly received from the liquor traffic?

Answer. None.

6. What means are you taking to cope with the low purchasing power of the dollar to meet salaries, supplies, etc.?

Answer. Special taxes upon present sources of revenue.

7. Do you find complaint because, besides Federal, you have a State income tax?

Answer. Yes.

8. What are the principal and most satisfactory sources of revenue in your State?

Answer. Receipts from different departments, corporation taxes, inheritance taxes, State tax, etc.

Mr. Chairman, I have here valuable information from every section of the country, and all to the same effect. There is a persistent increase in the cost of government throughout the Nation. Both city and State are aware of it, and many are already battling with the problem. I am convinced that it is one of the problems demanding immediate attention which is not confined to this body. Cost of government is expressed in the taxes to be paid. If the cost continues to rise, the tax must continue to grow. In that case there is little hope of a revision of our present tax system, which is a war-tax system, and should not continue in times of peace.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason I asked for time was to submit these facts which had been collected to ascertain whether this high cost of government is permanent or not and what chance we have for reduction of taxes. We are bewildered when we bring in a bill like the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, in which we think there is a tremendous cut because so far below what the executive departments estimated as their needs. We are told after all the cut it makes that the appropriation is still four times what it was in 1914. When we bring in a bill like the Army bill, which the Secretary of War estimated for 576,000 soldiers and which we cut to less than 300,000 soldiers, when we base the appropriation on this tremendously reduced Army, we are bewildered to find that we are making an appropriation for this Army of three or four times what it was in 1916. If an explanation is demanded we are told that it costs now three times what it did then. That we may realize what sensitiveness there existed on great expenditures of government—as expressed, for example, in this resolution that I desire to read, because it is a matter of history and is very interesting—I read from a plant in the Democratic platform of 1912:

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befit a democratic government, and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

That is in 1912, gentlemen, and I have looked up the appropriations for the year before that, the subject of this denunciation. The appropriations amounted to $682,000,000 and a fraction, not quite $683,000,000. That was only eight years ago. We looked upon an expenditure of $682,000,000 as abnormally high, and it was so high that it served as a plank in one of the great political party's platform. And yet next year, two years after the close of this war, the estimates that have come to us, not counting the deficiency for the railroads or anything for the soldiers' bonus, will be over five times what they were prior to the war. And when I say prior to the war I mean the cost up to 1916, when the high-water mark was a little over a billion dollars.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does not the gentleman think that Congress ought to do its part toward reducing these expenses?

Mr. FESS. Absolutely. That is what we have been attempting all through this Congress.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the proposed budget system help to reduce it?

Mr. FESS. It will, and I am glad it is so far on the way to adoption.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will it take away any of the powers of Congress to cut these different things?

Mr. FESS. No. Now, I did not read this plank in the Democratic platform in order to inject any politics into my remarks; I read it to indicate that in 1912 we thought that $682,000,000 was abnormally high; and yet we have brought in estimates for our appropriations next year, without counting at least the railroad deficiency, which will have to be made up whatever we do about the other vast items urged in some quarters—without counting that we have a charge upon the Treasury that will be seven and a half times what it was in 1912 when this plank was adopted. What I am trying to get at is, Are we entering upon a basis of expenditure that makes this figure permanent? If we are there is absolutely no hope of a reduction of taxation in the sum total. We may be able to revise our tax laws, but not upon a basis of reduction, unless we find some way of cutting this cost of government.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman not think that these activities on the part of the Federal Government, a great many activities inaugurated during the war, and in which we are now engaged, and which we did not have eight years ago, are in a large part responsible for the increased expenses?

Mr. FESS. Yes; and we ought to get rid of them at once. It has been our contention ever since the war closed that all war agencies must be discontinued as soon as it is possible to do it, and get rid of them as soon as it is physically possible to do it. But here is the difficulty: Numerous agencies were inaugurated for war purposes which would not have been thought of had it not been in war time, and then heaven and earth are moved to maintain them—to continue them through peace times. We are importuned from all hands to make appropriations, estimated by the millions, recommended by the departments. We simply must face this demand unless we are willing to say that these high costs of government are going to be permanent.

I have spoken of the cost of government to get an expression of its burden in taxation. It is only one phase of the high cost of living, so widely distressing to the country. Now let me speak briefly of the cost of production. The cost of living is still going up. In spite of all the talk that we do here in Congress and what the departments charged with the responsibility are doing, the cost of living still goes up. I have had occasion before to call attention to the serious blunder of the administration's assumption that this high-cost level is a matter of legislation. This assumption ignores all laws of economics, and it also feeds the antigovernment sentiment of our people. The dissatisfied are led to believe that their suffering is due to the character of government under which they live. The blunders of the Justice Department are greatly aggravated by persistent promises of intention to lower cost and numerous statements of success already achieved, when everybody knows that Government interference with business increases rather than decreases this cost.

My friends, we are indulging in too much useless talk about our ability to reduce the cost of living by legislation. The one greatest element in the cost of living, as everyone must recognize, is in decreased production and, secondly, in the cheapening of the measuring unit of value. What very much distresses me is the decreased production both on the part of the farm and in industry. The decreased production on the farm is inevitable and is due, first, to a lessening in the number of workers on the farm, which, in turn, is due to at least two things: First, the war took our boys from the farm, and when they went into the service, like those who were taken from the professions, such as school work, they got a different taste of life, and those boys are not returning to the farms from the service as they went from the farms to the service. An examination of the facts makes this statement undisputed. It is easily understood and there is a very good reason for it. In that respect you are losing a number of farmers from that source. Farm life, although it is increasingly attractive in some ways and is becoming more so every day, is not as attractive to-day as is city life, and every boy on the farm who reads a paper which comes to the farm reads not of the activities of the farm but of the activities of the city, and his daily food, mentally speaking, is merely an incentive to stimulate his desire to get away from the farm into the city, and he goes there. It is a condition that is most difficult to handle. It can not be controlled by mere talk in legislative halls.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman has stated a deplorable situation confronting the country. Can he state a remedy to correct this condition?

Mr. FESS. Yes; the remedy is twofold. If possible, you must make the farm more attractive to invite the youth of the land. It must be attractive, first, by better roads, and by more conveniences; and, secondly, attractive in that what the farmer does he will get remuneration for, which of itself makes it not only attractive but profitable. It may be necessary for us also to increase the acreage of tillable land. If anyone can show me that such would be the result I am willing to join with him at any time and take steps toward increasing the acreage of the country, if it is for the purpose of increasing production, but I do not want any promoter plan that is purely on paper, which looks to removing stumps and clearing swamps. I am willing to do that, however, if it can be shown that it can be done profitably, so that the country would gain rather than lose in the transaction. I would do that as a conservation measure, if it be made feasible. That is one way to increase production. Secondly—and I want the membership of the House to notice this—if we do not turn the current back from the city to the farm and produce the world's demand for food, there is danger ahead of us. No one can overstate the importance of the production of food to feed the world. I do not talk about the world starving, but there is danger if, instead of steps being taken to produce more, steps are taken to produce less in order to control production. There are 12,000,000 acres less in wheat this year than last, according to my information.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman know that every time they cut down the acreage of wheat 1 acre they increase the acreage of corn 1 acre?

Mr. FESS. I do not know that that is true. I do not think it is the case, but rather the inability to secure labor for the farm.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman know of any good land anywhere that is not being used?

Mr. FESS. I know that there is a good deal of land not being used; whether it is good or not, or whether it can be made good, is a matter of opinion. Every acre of land ought to be used.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But where are you going to get the labor to do that?

Mr. FESS. Let me say to the gentleman that there is not a maximum of farm production, and the reason for it is that you can not get the labor to do what is necessary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the gentleman ever found anybody who knew any way to keep a fellow from going to town?

Mr. FESS. No; and that is our problem. It may be that nothing but disaster will solve the problem.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman speaks of a reduction of 12,000,000 of acres in wheat under what was in wheat last year. Is not that due to the high wages paid farm labor, compelling the farmers to curtail their activities?

Mr. FESS. That is certainly one phase of it. That is what I had in mind when I answered my friend from Missouri. The cost of labor prohibits its employment on the farm at the price paid the farmer for his products. We are interrupting the process of production; we are taking out of the channels of production men who ought to be there and putting them into the class of middlemen, who are not producers, but simply distributors. How you can help that I do not know, except to make the producer as profitable as the distributor, and that means increase of cost of living, but if we do not help it there is going to be trouble.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Instead of the gentleman's proposition being true that we are putting men into the middlemen's class, are we not putting too many men in office?

Mr. FESS. That is true also. I have such information from city and State. Our duty here is to reduce the nonproductive officeholder.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The Government has become so highly organized, and we have so many bureaus and departments and commissions and committees, that there are literally thousands of them here who ought to be back on the farm.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman. There is a wide movement in States like Massachusetts and Kansas to concentrate, thereby reducing this source of expense.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Has the gentleman any fear with respect to the wheat production this year? Does the gentleman think that it will meet the normal requirement for the country?

Mr. FESS. My figures here estimate a production of 248,000,000 bushels less of winter wheat than last year.

Mr. COOPER. We had a hearing before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee this morning, and the representatives of the Kansas people were there and stated that to-day in the elevators of Kansas there is $175,000,000 worth of grain ready to be put on the market.

Mr. FESS. That would mean less than 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for our 100,000,000 people until harvest time, to say nothing about Europe's needs. I also note that the press states that the Kansas prospect for this year is as fine as it has ever been; but if my friend will go through the State of Ohio, which is in a sense a wheat State, and take notice, he would see that our prospects are very poor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is it not a fact that in regard to the question of farm labor the farmer can not afford to pay the high wages that he must necessarily pay in order to get the labor?

Mr. FESS. That is true. He loses his labor and his farm is not worked to its capacity. The city is more attractive and more profitable, and the farmer can not pay the price he has to pay to meet the competition of the city. Let me give you a few figures. The cost of government to-day, as I mentioned before, is more than five times what it was in 1914. The cost of living, expressed, for example, in the railroad business, has been augmented by an increase of a billion two hundred and forty million dollars under Government operation, and now there is an additional demand of over a billion dollars increase to comply with the railroad law, and if we take up the demands of the brotherhoods, as stated by Mr. Carter before the adjustment board, and meet them, we have another additional billion as expressed in the transportation business alone. This additional cost is expressed in more than $3,000,000,000 over what it was in 1917. Here is another example of increase of cost of living because the Government pays for it out of the people's earnings. Take the Shipping Board. I asked the Committee on Appropriations yesterday what we had paid in money to that board and they said something over $3,000,000,000. That outlay has, up to date, but little to show save a promise of future outlay. I can not find that we are getting anything in return. At least, the board seems to be unable to give us any information on its business, and we do not know, therefore, whether the operation is productive, profitable, or not. Here is a new source of governmental outlay which has small respect for economy. Over $3,000,000,000 and more already expended and still more demanded, we are told, which will help to bring a deficit at the end of the fiscal year of $4,000,000,000, after we have already expended four billions provided for this year in our last revenue measure, when we were assured that four billions would be all we needed instead of the eight billions, the demands now upon us.

When we pass over the merchant marine to private enterprise to avoid the inevitable waste of governmental operation it will cost less, but considerably more than it would prior to the war, because of this high-cost level of production.

It is bewildering to me. There is another element that enters into the high-cost level which stirs my concern, and that is the reduction due to decreased efficiency not only on the farm but in industry. This is rather a sensitive question, but I want the sympathetic attention of the committee. I conversed in Chicago with a man who was on the job directing the building of a piece of construction work under the direction of the Government. I asked him what wage was being paid there, because there has been so much concern about the increase of wages. He said, "$9 a day, but I probably will have to pay $1.25 an hour for eight hours, because that is what the men are asking." I asked him, "What were they getting before the war?" He said, "Between $4 and $6 a day." That is not the striking thing, because such an increase is not beyond the general rise in cost level, but this is the striking thing: I asked him what was considered a day's work in the laying of brick before the war. "From 2,000 to 2,400 brick" was his reply. "What is it now?" He said, "A thousand brick a day." That means we are paying twice as much per day and getting half as much done. In other words, we are decreasing production to the man and increasing the cost to the public, which in its final analysis is to the individual, who constitute the public.

This is noticeable in all lines of production. While the operation of the railroads increased $1,240,000,000 over a period of nine months in 1919 in comparison with the same time in 1917, the amount of freight decreased in the same period 39,000,000,000 ton-miles.

If we compare building operations, we have the same facts. In 1914 building operations amounted to 575,400,000 square feet, at a cost of $891,845,500. That is a cost of $1.55 per square foot. In 1919 we built 458,900,000 square feet, or over 100,000,000 square feet less, and it cost $1,467,821,300, or nearly twice as much. It was a cost of $3.20 per square foot. Here again we have less production and more than double the cost.

If we compare food products we have some interesting facts. We produced in 1919 147,000,000 bushels of corn more than we did in 1917. We produced 5,104,000 less bales of cotton than we did in 1914. We produced 142,000,000 tons less of coal than we did in 1918. We produced $10,157,900 less of gold, $4,789,919 less of silver, and 9,000,000 tons less of steel ingots.

This decrease of production may be in line with a policy to control production so as to stabilize prices. There has been a demand to take control so as to prevent overproduction. The limit can be gained by shortening hours of work and limiting what is regarded as speeding-up production. For years here in Congress we have been compelled to observe a movement resisting efficiency in labor. All bonuses for work above the average have been resisted. The constant and persistent demands for shorter days have the same effect upon prices. The overtime and increased number to do same work have similar effect on prices.

The agitation in coal and steel industries, as well as in all basic industries, for a shorter day is sure to lead to a similar demand on the farm. At first it will be made by the laborer on the farm for the same reason that it is demanded in industries.

Then the farmer will ultimately see that his defense is in controlling the price of his product by limiting its production. This may be done by either limiting acreage cultivated or his hours of labor. Either will insure his price of his product, which the public, including labor, must pay.

If our unwisdom in demanding shorter days, less work, and more pay reaches the farmer and becomes his policy, our people will experience a food problem and a range of cost level no one now can fully comprehend. The farmer, the food producer, has the strangle hold. He should not be forced by the exigencies of high cost, including his labor, to tighten his hold. No honest man will deny to him what he demands for himself. If lessened production is to be the rule for one it will be just to permit it to all, including the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, the greatest law for us to commend is our willingness to produce to the maximum instead of producing to the minimum. [Applause.] I am not saying this unkindly, but there certainly is a tendency in order to control matters to reduce the production and thereby keep up the high cost level, and what we ought to do is to reach the maximum of production and then, of course, try, if possible, to see that everybody is employed at the best possible wage and the best possible reward be given to all classes of producers. But the danger is in the loss of production, reducing efficiency, and increasing the cost, and anybody here on this floor can see the outcome of that if we do not change to a different philosophy. I do not see any way, my friends, for curing the cost of living except to realize, in the language of Thomas Carlisle, that there is a perennial nobleness in work and no man ought to be ashamed to work. The danger is not in being employed and overworked, but the danger is in idleness that may be produced under these false principles. [Applause.] I do not know how this false philosophy is going to be cured. We have got to get more producers on the farm. As to production in the industries, we must get a different attitude. There is not a bit of doubt but what the employers have taken advantage of men and have driven the men to take positions which otherwise they would not take. Hundreds of examples can be cited of such cases, all of which should have been avoided. While I am not concerned about men demanding additional wages, because I believe a high wage scale is better than a low scale, yet what I am concerned about is the production of the thing the country must have. The high cost will become prohibitive unless production will catch up with consumption.

There is another cause here, and that is the unlimited demand from Europe, and, my friends, as long as we hold out that we are going to finance Europe and extend credits with which to buy American products, upon the hope that if they are not able to pay that ultimately we will cancel the engagements, positively there is no limit to what they will ask. [Applause.] What we need, in my judgment, is to compel the world to again go to work, not only this country but Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the enormous inflation of both our credit and our currency have much if not most to do with the high cost of living. Our dollar buys a fraction over 50 cents' worth of goods. This is partially due to the paper-money craze of the world. It is partly due to our inexcusable extravagance both as a Government and a people. The Government spent millions to borrow billions to be lavishly distributed among our people, all of whom, producer and consumer, became profiteers. The Government unwisely allowed a Federal Reserve System to respond to expansion which does not respond to the needs of contraction. The fiat value in our circulation medium is apparent. While the reports indicate $55 per capita, our volume of money shows nearer $77 per capita.

Our remedies for these problems are plain: Set the example of producing more by a better attitude of all toward the national problem. Stop all unnecessary Government expenditures. Cut wherever it can be done. Get away from the war stage back to peace conduct of business. Embrace the business principles of the budget and limit outgo to our income. The people must exercise more frugality in spending and lay up for a rainy day.

We must not allow Europe's demands to lead us to further induce European idleness.

Steps must be taken to increase the purchasing power of the dollar. This can be done, but must be done carefully.

We must revise our system of taxation just as soon as the present demands upon the Treasury will permit it. That must be soon.

In the face of these problems and their possible solution, I can not avoid cautioning against making any demands which are not absolutely necessary. This applies to capital in its wish to be free of heavy tax.

It applies to labor in its wish for high wages. It applies to the soldiers in their wish for a cash bonus.

It applies to all our people in their wild orgy of extravagance. This is a time for sober thought and rational reasoning. It is no time for ultimatums unless Uncle Sam desires it.

Mr. Chairman, never before in our history have the times called more loudly for men who are willing to stand up and be counted, even though it might mean defeat.

However, no man should hesitate in a policy when the welfare of all the people is at stake. Such is the time and such is our problem this hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3016) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2528) to grant certain lands to the city of Pocatello, State of Idaho, for conserving and protecting the source of its water supply and as a municipal park site.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2792) to enlarge the boundaries of the Oregon National Forest.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CURTIS, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. KENDRICK as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President, pursuant to the provisions of section 6 of the Post Office appropriation act approved April 24, 1920, had appointed Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. STERLING, Mr. MOSES, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts members on the part of the Senate of the joint commission created thereunder to investigate and report to Congress on the methods and systems of handling, transporting, and delivering the mails and the facilities therefor.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4286. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000 for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant and for the construction of a public-school building," approved September 29, 1919.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 302) authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I shall devote my time to the consideration of the "zone" postal law recently applied to the second-class mail of this country. The Magazine Trust has decreed the destruction of that law, and with it, if necessary to that end, the destruction of any person or official who, from a patriotic sense of duty, may stand in the way. Mr. Taft and Mr. Hitchcock were the innocent victims of that trust. Mr. Burleson is in the center of its barrage. The assaults upon the Postmaster General, however, might have more weight if accompanied with a degree of consistency. The big publishers condemn the Postmaster General on his administration of the wires; at the same time they approve and applaud the Director General of the Railways for pursuing a like course with respect to those properties. How they can condemn the one and condone the other for doing the same thing is a matter for them to explain. If the Postmaster General should change his views with reference to the "zone" question, he might then receive the plaudits of those who now so bitterly assail him. "Who is here so rude" as to doubt this? Let Shakespeare answer: "If any speak; for him have I offended."

For 33 years prior to July 1, 1918, newspapers and magazines were carried through the mails at a uniform rate of 1 cent per pound. This is commonly referred to as the "flat" rate, because it was the same both for short and for long distances. Under it a newspaper publisher at Eagle Lake, Tex., paid 1 cent per pound on newspapers mailed to Lissie, a distance of 8 miles. A magazine publisher in New York also paid 1 cent per pound on magazines sent to Manila, a distance of 8,000 miles. The actual cost to the Government on the newspaper carried 8 miles and handled but once was comparatively small, while conveying the magazine 8,000 miles and with numerous handlings was an expensive proposition.

As an illustration of the cost of handling such magazines in the mails I will cite a single instance. It has been shown that the cost to the Government on a single copy of the Saturday Evening Post mailed at Philadelphia to a subscriber in Point Barrow, Alaska, was $4.84, while the publisher paid the Government under the "flat" rate system slightly less than 1 cent for that service. The loss to the Government was therefore a little more than $4.83 on each copy. A year's subscription of 52 numbers to such a subscriber would cost the Government more than $251 to handle it through the mails, while the Government would receive from the publisher less than 52 cents, the actual loss amounting to more than $250 a year on each such yearly subscription.

That the Government has been losing and losing heavily on its second-class mail will not be denied by anyone who is at all posted upon the subject. Every Postmaster General in the last 30 years, without a single exception, has called attention to the second-class mail subsidy and need for revision in rates.

In 1887 Postmaster General Vilas, on page 4 of his report, calls attention to the fact that newspapers and periodicals furnished about one-third of the mails but paid only about one-fortieth of the revenue. In the same report his Third Assistant called attention to various abuses of the second-class privilege.

In 1888 Mr. Dickinson, on page 28 of his report, called attention to the fact that second-class matter mailed during the year amounted to more than 143,000,000 pounds, while the revenue received from it was a little over $1,436,000. On page 689 of the same report his Third Assistant severely criticized the 1-cent flat rate.

In 1889 Mr. Wanamaker, on page 43 of his report, says:

The press has become the leading contributor to the volume of the mails. The specially favored class are newspapers and periodical publications. They are designated as second-class matter, and postage is chargeable at 1 cent per pound.

In 1890, 1891, and 1892 Mr. Wanamaker continues to call attention to the subsidy in even more forcible language.

In 1893 Mr. Bissell, on page 27, says:

The paid mailings during the year of second-class matter aggregated in weight over 255,000,000 pounds, which brought in a postage revenue of $2,556,342.13. Adding weight of free matter of this class, a total of nearly 301,000,000 pounds, which represents an increase of more than 14 per cent, this rate of increase is double that of postal revenue taken in its entirety.

In 1894 Mr. Bissell again calls attention to this matter in his report.

In 1895 Mr. Wilson, among other things, calls attention to the fact that the loss on second-class matter for the preceding year was over $18,570,000.

In 1896 Mr. Wilson again calls attention to this loss.

In 1897 Mr. Gary, on page 6 of his report, says:

The injustice inflicted both upon the postal revenue and the people by existing laws regulating carrying of second-class matter has been presented to Congress in reports from this department for 10 years past with cumulative force, but without effect in remedial legislation. By acts of Congress passed in 1874, 1879, 1885, and 1894, a privileged class has been created, entitled to the use of the United States Mail Service either free of charge or at a cost far below the price the Government is compelled to pay for the transportation of the mails thus carried. The loss on this service, now amounting to more than $26,000,000 a year, is defrayed out of the proceeds of taxation drawn from all classes of the people.

In 1898 Mr. Smith, on page 4 of his report, called attention to the gross abuse of the second-class privilege, and the deficit on account thereof.

In 1899 Mr. Smith further says:

The most urgent need of the Postal Service is the rectification of the enormous wrongs which have grown up in abuse of the privileges accorded by law to second-class matter. * * * This costly abuse weights down the service, trammels the power and means of effective advancement in every direction. It involves a sheer wanton waste of $20,000,000 or upward a year.

In 1900 Mr. Smith, on page 13 of his report, refers to his previous reports in which he strenuously urged remedial legislation, and called attention to publications that circulated simply for advertising, and further says:

The subject is one which should not be permitted to drop until vital reform is accomplished.

He also called attention to the fact that the reforms recommended would effect a saving of from twelve to twenty million dollars a year, but added that it would encounter strenuous hostility of special interests, the expense of whose private business was largely paid by the Government instead of by themselves. On pages 689–690 his Third Assistant had much more to say upon this subject.

In 1901, on page 12, Mr. Smith further calls attention to the abuse of the second-class privilege, cost of handling, periodicals for advertising, and so forth, and adds:

The extent of the complicity of the Government in these purely private enterprises is not generally realized. The statement will probably be surprising that in case of hundreds of such publications, wherever the publisher spends $1,000 in his venture, the Government spends not less than $2,000 in carrying on that publisher's business. Astonishing as this statement is, it is easily made plain.

In 1902 Mr. Payne, on page 28 of his report, calls attention to the abuses of the second-class privilege, and refers to the report of his Third Assistant Postmaster General. He then adds:

It seems to have been but little appreciated that a publisher's mail privilege is in fact a subsidy.

In 1904 Mr. Wynne, on page 16 of his report, calls attention to the needs of revision of the second-class rates.

In 1905 Mr. Cortelyou, on page 75 of his report, calls attention to the cost of handling, as compared with revenue received, and further says:

Any person who has given it any casual thought admits the desirability—even the necessity—of a change. Any change, however, is certain to be resisted by those whose interests are benefited by present conditions.

In 1906 Mr. Cortelyou again calls attention to this matter.

In 1907 and 1908 Mr. Von L. Meyer called attention to the second-class mail abuse.

In 1909 Mr. Hitchcock, on page 8 of his report, called attention to the fact that the volume of second-class mail had increased to over 700,000,000 pounds, and called attention to abuses.

In 1910, 1911, and 1912 Mr. Hitchcock again called attention to those abuses.

In 1913 Mr. Burleson, on page 28 of his report, says:

Mailings of newspapers and periodicals as second-class matter at the cent-a-pound rate and "free in county" during the fiscal year 1913 for the first time in the history of the Postal Service exceeded a billion pounds. Although second-class matter constituted approximately 62 per cent of the aggregate weight of the domestic revenue-producing mail, it produced only 4.98 per cent of the postage derived from such mail.

Since 1913 Mr. Burleson's attitude with reference to this subject has been so well known as not to require further comment. I will add that for the year 1917, the last year of the operation of the 1-cent-per-pound postal rate on magazines and newspapers, according to the most carefully laid estimates of the Post Office Department, the cost to the Government in handling that class of mail was more than $85,000,000 in excess of the amount of postage paid by the publishers.

Such, gentlemen, is the testimony of those best qualified to speak upon this subject. Here we have the official statement of every Postmaster General during the 33-year period the 1-cent-per-pound flat rate was in operation. Thirteen Postmasters General in all, nine Republican and four Democratic, all without regard to their political affiliation, have uniformly condemned that law.

Is further evidence required? If so, then look to the reports of the several commissions that have dealt with this question. The Penrose-Overstreet and the Hughes Commissions, so much lauded by the representatives of the Magazine Trust because of their supposed antipathy to zone charges, have each shown in their reports that the cost to the Government in handling the second-class mail was far in excess of the amount received from the publishers for that service.

On page 8 of the report, the Penrose-Overstreet Commission said:

There are four cardinal defects in the present system of charges for second-class matter:

1. The difference between the second-class rate and the next higher rate, the third-class rate, is too great. In other words, the second-class rate is relatively too low.
2. Wholly dissimilar services are performed for the same rate.
3. Substantially similar services are charged different rates.
4. The second-class rate is probably too low, absolutely speaking.

The report then says:

The first of the above-mentioned defects is self-evident.

The Hughes Commission, after making a most exhaustive investigation of the subject of the cost of second-class mail, in the fourth subdivision of its findings said:

Fourth. That in the fiscal year 1908, for which the department's statistics were compiled, the cost of the subclasses of second-class mail known as paid-at-the-pound-rate, free-in-county, and transient matter for the services of transportation, post-office cars, railway distributions, rural delivery, and certain miscellaneous items directly assignable was as follows: Paid-at-the-pound-rate matter, approximately 6 cents a pound; free-in-county, approximately 5 cents a pound; transient, approximately 5 cents a pound.

From this finding it will be seen that the second class, for which the Government received 1 cent per pound, actually cost the Government 6 cents per pound to handle, and this 6-cent estimate did not include a proportion of the overhead charges properly assignable to it. The commission did not make an apportionment of the overhead charges, for the reason that it did not have sufficient data upon that feature, as stated in the seventh subdivision of its findings, which is as follows:

Seventh. That to obtain the total cost of transporting and handling the subclasses of second-class mail, known as paid-at-the-pound-rate, free-in-county, and transient matter, it would be necessary to add to the ascertained cost for the services above mentioned the shares of these subclasses, respectively, in the general post-office expenses and miscellaneous outlays not directly assignable, for the proper apportionment of which the commission is without adequate data.

After prorating a reasonable proportion of the overhead expenses of the Post Office Department to the several classes of mail carried, the total cost of handling the second class in 1908 was found by the department to have been approximately 8 cents a pound. As the Government received only 1 cent a pound, it is plain enough that the actual loss was approximately 7 cents a pound on the entire amount handled. The volume of the second-class mail in recent years has exceeded a billion pounds annually; hence it is only a matter of calculation to show that the annual loss is over $70,000,000.

While neither the Penrose-Overstreet nor the Hughes Commissions directly favored the adoption of a zone system, still the only logical deduction to be drawn from their findings is that the absence of such system was a "cardinal defect" which could not be cured in any other way. If it was a "cardinal defect" to transport mails unequal distances at the same rate, then it follows that the only way to cure such defect would be to charge different rates for the different distances.

The quotation I have just given from the Penrose-Overstreet report—and which was designated by the commission as a "cardinal defect"—says:

Wholly dissimilar services are performed for the same rate.

Further commenting upon this, on page 21, the report says:

The second defect in the existing scheme of rates, viz, that dissimilar services are performed at the same rate, is, unlike the first, not apparent at a glance. But a moment's reflection will make it so. Apart from the fact that, like all other matter subject to the postal principle, second-class matter is transported unequal distances at the same charge, there are, too, highly important inequalities in the character of service rendered.

Here the report again specifically recognizes the defect in the postal principle in transporting this class of mail unequal distances for the same charge.

The same logical conclusions for a zone system are to be drawn from the report of the Hughes Commission. On page 138, in commenting upon the fact that the Government had no monopoly of the second-class postal privilege, and therefore the express companies would successfully compete with the Government on the short and profitable hauls, leaving the long and unprofitable hauls for the Government to perform, the report says:

So long as the Government transports and delivers second-class mail at the same rate throughout the United States, the shorter hauls without distribution of individual pieces will cost less, and hence be more remunerative than the longer hauls and the scattered distribution; and there being no monopoly, private enterprise is certain to compete for any portion of the business which may afford a profit, leaving to the post office that which costs more than it returns.

It was also shown by the report of the Hughes Commission that a flat-rate increase in the postal charges on second-class mail would render even more effective the competition by the express companies for the short and profitable hauls, as by such increase the postal rate on the short hauls would be made higher, while the express rate would remain the same, and that the effect of a flat increase in the rate would be to extend the zone of competition. Further commenting upon this feature, on page 140 the report says:

It is apparent, however, that if the postal rate were increased and that of the express companies should remain the same, these companies would have the carriage of all bulk shipments of second-class matter, not requiring for its distribution the special facilities of the post office, between the points described in the express classification. And the increase, according to its amount, would extend the zone of competition. This must necessarily be the case, unless different prices are charged for different distances or services; in other words, unless zone rates or other differentials are established.

Mr. Chairman, under the old flat-rate system the people were taxed to pay the cost of handling millions of tons of magazines and newspapers through the mails. During that period the volume of this class of business increased enormously, expanding from about 60,000,000 pounds in 1885 to over 1,200,000,000 pounds in 1918, when the volume of the second-class mail of the United States was one and one-half times greater than that of all the rest of the world combined. Not only did the volume of the business increase to such enormous proportions, but the character of the material thus handled underwent a change almost as great in proportion as was the increase in the volume.

In 1885, when the flat rate of 1 cent per pound was established, magazines consisted almost entirely of good and useful reading matter, less than 5 per cent of their space being devoted to advertisements. Under that flat-rate system they have become commercialized to the extent that they are now, on an average, considerably more than 50 per cent advertising matter. Consequently it goes without saying that if the Government has been losing money in handling the second-class mail much of that loss—even a majority of it—is due to those advertisements.

The larger publications, such as a few of the leading magazines and some of the great metropolitan newspapers, have been amassing great fortunes out of their advertising sections, and under the cheap flat postal rate they were able to send their publications all over the United States and to our insular possessions at the same rate the country publisher paid to send his papers to his neighbors in an adjoining county. As a consequence, the big and lucrative advertising business has drifted from the local newspapers to the magazines, leaving nothing in the advertising field for the country publisher but those ads which emanate from his local patrons and for which, as a rule, he is expected to extend a franking privilege.

For many years the Magazine Trust was successful in defeating all efforts at reform in the Postal Service with regard to the second-class mail. Its lobby exerted a power greater than that ever possessed by any other interest, from the fact that the columns of a dozen or more magazines and several scores of great metropolitan newspapers which reached many millions of readers were freely made use of to give publicity and prominence to those who would do their bidding, and to consign to political oblivion and "inocuous desuetude" those who could not be used to carry out their purposes. Mr. Hitchcock's proposal for a 4-cent rate on advertising sections was consigned to the wastebasket and Hitchcock with it, and the recommendation of the Hughes Commission for a 2-cent flat rate on both reading and advertising matter was permitted to "die aborning."

Mr. Chairman, I desire in this connection to call attention to some of the "big-stick" methods adopted by publishers to carry out their purposes. I will first refer to the telegram sent by the editor of the American Thresherman to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], then chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. This telegram is published in some of the hearings of that committee and is as follows:

MADISON, WIS., February 8, 1914.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman of the House Post Office Committee,
Washington, D. C.:

If you desire to bring the same fate upon your party which befell the Taft administration and caused its downfall, increase the second-class postage rates and you will successfully accomplish that result. The great Republican forces which helped to slug their own party for its many injustices in these matters, and beyond question this is the most unfair proposition imaginable and second only to the blunder (?) of Hitchcock's freight-train order for transporting publications. You will hear Rome howl north and south (?) if you carry this policy into effect.

B. B. CLARK,
Editor of the American Thresherman.

I will also read a brief extract from a statement given out by the Postmaster General on April 23, 1919. The part I desire to call attention to is as follows:

In fact, as stated, notice was given the Postmaster General more than a year ago what could be expected if there was not acquiescence on his part in the suspension or repeal of this law. At that time a member of the committee representing those contending for the repeal urged the Postmaster General to acquiesce therein, and in the course of conversation bluntly informed him, "We have made and unmade many Congressmen. We ruined Postmaster General Hitchcock and destroyed Mr. Taft. We realize that without your aid we may not be able to secure relief now, but we will see what can be done with the next Congress." Later, a well-known publisher called on the Postmaster General and also urged that he recommend the suspension or repeal of this law, saying to him: "If you will aid or acquiesce in the repeal of this law, we will make you the most popular man in the Wilson Cabinet, but if you do not, I fear they will ruin you." These two statements were made to the Postmaster General in the presence of the present First Assistant Postmaster General.

The present law placing advertising sections of magazines and newspapers under a "zone" system and regulating the charges in proportion to the distance carried was put through Congress as a war measure in the revenue bill of 1917. It is one of the legacies left us by that awful conflict for which the American people should feel thankful. The publishers' lobby had become so powerful that nothing short of war could probably ever have accomplished this great reform. The "big stick" of the Magazine Trust, so effective in time of peace, proved powerless in time of war. To now return to those prewar conditions would be the equivalent of placing the neck of the American Nation in the hangman's noose.

This "zone" law is here to stay, and those who have pinned their hopes on securing its repeal had just as well relieve their minds of any such illusion. As the purpose of the law becomes better known, the more it will meet with the approval of the American people. Aside from a few of the big publishers, a very large majority of the newspaper men themselves are in favor of the retention of this law.

I recently had occasion to poll the country newspapers upon the subject, and of the more than 6,000 publishers who responded to my request for their views, over two-thirds favored the "zone" law and opposed its repeal. Many of those who opposed the law stated that their only objection to it was based upon the extra trouble it entailed, rather than upon a fundamental reason. Of the 1,984 publishers who at first responded as being opposed to the "zone" law, quite a number have since informed me that upon further investigation they had discovered their error and were now in favor of it. Of the 4,027 who favored the law in the first instance, not one has ever notified me of any change of mind. This but illustrates the fact that the people have only to understand this law to be in favor of it.

To obtain the views of these publishers I prepared a form letter with questionnaire attached, copy of which was furnished to all newspaper publishers in cities and towns of 50,000 population and under. The questionnaire contained but three inquiries, as follows:

Are you in favor of the so-called zone rates on second-class matter? Answer yes or no. * * *

Are you opposed to the so-called zone rates on second-class matter? If so, do you favor a repeal? * * *

If you are in favor of a repeal, what would you suggest in lieu of same? * * *

I was anxious to obtain the views of that class which I will term the "little publisher," those away from the great centers of population, and who had hitherto been silent upon the subject. The country press, as a rule, is free from the pernicious influences that have gained so much power over the magazine and metropolitan press. Mr. Balfour unquestionably had this thought in mind when he recently said: "Upon the rural press of America rests the fate of civilization." Though my questionnaire was not originally intended for the publishers of the great cities, still it found its way to many of them, and several hundred responses were received which were tabulated and counted with the others.

The Postmaster General kindly consented to have the questionnaire delivered to the publishers through the respective postmasters, and gave me a letter to that effect, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

THE POSTMASTER:

The Post Office Department is interested in this subject to the extent that it is desired that the poll shall be complete and accurate. I will appreciate it, therefore, if you will lend your assistance and cooperation in the matter to that end. Kindly hand the inclosed letter of Representative MANSFIELD, or a copy thereof, to each newspaper publisher at your office and request him to mail his reply direct to Mr. MANSFIELD.

A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

I have here in tabulated form the result of this poll, arranged both by States and by congressional districts. From this it will be observed that out of the 48 States heard from the press of 44 States favored the zone law. The four States in which the result was opposed to the law are Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, and West Virginia. In Massachusetts the opposition to the zone had 5 majority, in West Virginia 2, and in Connecticut 1. In Illinois the majority was 67, the poll standing 258 for and 325 against the law. Of the responses received from the State of Illinois 239 came from the city of Chicago, and 211 of these were opposed to the "zone." Outside of the great city of Chicago the press of the State of Illinois, so far as heard from, is in favor of the "zone" law by more than a two-thirds majority.

Additional to the four States mentioned in this connection whose press showed opposition to the zone law, it was also opposed by a majority of the publishers of the District of Columbia, Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. The eight publishers responding from Hawaii were evenly divided, four for and four against the zone. Those places remote were evidently influenced by the propaganda of the magazines, that being doubtless their only available literature upon the subject. I am sorry that I was unable to secure a more complete poll, several thousand newspaper publishers still being unheard from. It is very evident that many have not yet made investigation, or else are entirely indifferent upon the question. I will now read the result as I obtained it:

Mr. Chairman, as a further proof of the great favor in which the zone law is held by the newspaper men of the United States, I will call attention to a few of the resolutions of indorsement passed by various press associations. I recently made an effort to obtain copies of these resolutions, but the time has been so short I have heard from only a few. I have those with which I have been furnished up to this time. They are as follows:

Texas Press Association, San Antonio, June, 1919.
Southern Illinois Editorial Association, East St. Louis, October, 1919.
Missouri Press Association, Springfield, October, 1919.
Inland Daily Press Association, Chicago, October, 1919.
Northern Daily Press Association, Minneapolis, January, 1919.
North Dakota People's Press Association, Fargo, September, 1918.
Kansas Editorial Association, Alma, 1919.
Missouri Press Association, Columbia, 1918.
Oklahoma Press Association, Shawnee, May, 1919.
North Dakota People's Press Association, Bismarck.
Nebraska Press Association, Gering, August, 1919.
Montana State Press Association, Great Falls, September, 1919.
Northwestern Daily Press Association, Minneapolis, July, 1919.
Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, Asheville, July, 1919.
National Editorial Association, Seattle, August, 1919.

The association last named—the National Editorial Association—is the largest organization of its kind in the world, and includes nearly 5,000 weekly and daily newspapers. This organization has gone on record in favor of the zone law on several occasions.

In the month of June of last year I had the honor of an invitation to address the Texas State Press Association upon this subject. The meeting was held in the city of San Antonio, and several hundred were in attendance. Resolutions of indorsement of the zone law were adopted by a rising vote.

So much, gentlemen, for the favor in which this law is held by the members of the press. Let us now see how it is regarded by the business men of the country. I have from time to time filed and had referred to the Committee on Ways and Means copies of resolutions adopted by chambers of commerce, agricultural, industrial, and other great associations throughout the country protesting against the repeal of the zone law. I have here a few others to which I will call attention. Here are resolutions by the—

Merchants' Association, Laredo, Tex., June, 1919.
Chamber of Commerce, Denton, Tex., July, 1919.
Retail Merchants' Association, Denton, Tex., July, 1919.
Chamber of Commerce, Houston, Tex., June, 1919.
American Hampshire Sheep Association, Detroit, May, 1919.
Extension Table Manufacturers' Association, Chicago, March, 1919.
National Wholesale Druggists' Association, New Orleans, November, 1919.
National Wholesale Grocers' Association, Cincinnati, June, 1919.
Farmers' Educational Cooperative Union of America, New Orleans, 1919.

Similar resolutions by other business and commercial organizations have been adopted at various places throughout the country the past year.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding this law is just and equitable to all concerned, yet it must be borne in mind that a powerful organization has been placed on foot to encompass its defeat. A trust has been formed, more harmful and dangerous than any other trust that was ever organized, for the reason that it represents not only a "combination in restraint of trade," but a combination in restraint of human intelligence, a combination that practically has control of the means for the transmission of information and thought in this country.

The publishers' trust does not admit the little newspaper man into its fold. It is composed of the publishers of magazines and publishers of those newspapers which have a wide circulation, those that carry heavy sections of advertising matter, which are transported great distances through the mails. It embraces but a few of the publishers in point of numbers, but it includes in its membership those who have the means necessary to carry out their purposes and who are in a position to practically dictate just what shall and what shall not be printed and sent out for the American people to read.

Several of the magazines in this trust have a circulation of more than a million each, and it is a safe estimate that each copy is read by two or three persons who are not subscribers. Collectively the great magazines and newspapers in the trust reach at least 80 per cent of the people of the United States. There are approximately 250 publications in the combine that was organized to fight the "zone" law. Through these publications the director in charge of the work has it in his power to reach at least three-fourths of the people of the United States each month, a thing an advocate of the "zone" law could not accomplish in a year even at an expenditure of several million dollars.

As a matter of fact, it has been quite impossible for an advocate of the "zone" law to reach the public through these magazines at all, as they positively refuse to publish anything said upon that side of the question. You reach the public only through publicity, and in the matter of publicity the great publishers, of course, have a monopoly. The country, in fact, is completely at their mercy in this respect, and they are cold-blooded enough to take advantage of the situation. A thing that serves their purposes is published and read by millions. If antagonistic to their interests, it is not published at all, however true it may be.

Mr. Chairman, the power of the press to make and unmake men and measures at will, and to conceal, misrepresent, and suppress facts, is, in my judgment, the greatest menace that could confront the American Nation. Under a flat-rate postal system the periodicals would continue to be published in one city, and, through those and their subsidiary publications, less than a score of men would completely dominate the entire country. It is, in effect, the equivalent of giving to those few men the power of censorship over the press, with all the tendency for evil that term implies. Under such system 110,000,000 people are as so many pawns upon the chessboard, and their destiny as so much clay in the hands of the potter.

As an illustration of their methods, I will call attention to one instance that came under my observation where much publicity was given to a statement, wholly untrue, and on account of which great inconvenience, discontent, hardship, and mental and physical suffering were inflicted upon our soldiers in France. Yet, there was no way to correct it until too late. Some of you gentlemen may doubtless recall the propaganda that was carried on during the winter and spring of 1919 to the effect that the great religious societies of this country had been penalized to the extent of several thousand dollars as penalty postage on magazines sent to our Expeditionary Forces in France, because France was in the eighth postal zone.

I made an effort to correct this propaganda through Leslie's Weekly, one of the magazines that carried it, but the editor refused to publish my letter. He knew full well that his editorial had been read by at least 1,000,000 people, and that I, or anyone else in an effort to correct it, could not reach as many without incurring a cost of many thousands of dollars, a thing with me impossible. In any event, the purpose of such propaganda is always carried out long before any corrections can be made and the public informed as to the facts. I have here copy of the editorial in question, which appeared in Leslie's Weekly of date March 1, 1919, which says:

> A striking instance of the injustice of the zone law is found in the $7,000 of penalty postage that the Y. M. C. A. last year had to pay on 15,000 subscriptions to two leading publications for its huts in France, because they were in the eighth postal zone.

My reply to this editorial, which Leslie refused to publish, is as follows:

MAY 26, 1919.

EDITOR LESLIE'S WEEKLY.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to an editorial in your issue of March 1, 1919, containing statements that were evidently based upon a misapprehension of facts. In speaking of the zone postal law, you say:

"A striking instance of the injustice of the zone law is found in the $7,000 of penalty postage that the Y. M. C. A. last year had to pay on 15,000 subscriptions to two leading publications for its huts in France because they were in the eighth postal zone."

As a matter of fact the rate of postage upon publications sent to our soldiers overseas was considerably under the domestic rate. In the month of July, 1917, the Interstate Commerce Commission, after due consideration, entered an order authorizing the Post Office Department to make a special rate of 1 cent each upon all publications, regardless of weight, sent to the soldiers in France. This order was immediately put into effect and under it the Y. M. C. A., with millions of others, availed itself of this special rate. Magazines weighing a pound were sent to the soldiers in France for 1 cent, while the regular rate, even in the first zone in this country, was 1½ cents.

But, furthermore, I have a categorial denial of this charge from the headquarters of the Y. M. C. A., under date of February 8, 1919, about three weeks before your editorial appeared in print. I had previously received from constituents in Texas printed propaganda containing this identical charge. I applied for information, not believing that any publisher would penalize a Christian institution on magazines for the brave boys who in a foreign land were shedding their blood for us when no other subscribers within the eighth zone were being so penalized. The reply received in response to my letter stated, in part, as follows:

"A careful inquiry in the office of the comptroller of the war-work council does not reveal any apparent overcharge by any magazine publishers because of postal rates. * * * This is the first time this subject has been brought to our attention and we were entirely unaware at headquarters that any such statement was being made in our name. * * * No one has been authorized to make any statement of such a character in behalf of the Y. M. C. A., nor is anyone justified in making such a statement."

You further say in your editorial:

"The zone system is a revival of an archaic plan which Lincoln put an end to and which was condemned by Mr. Wilson when governor of New Jersey."

Permit me to suggest that this statement is also founded upon misapprehension of fact. By examination of the postal laws passed by Congress you will find that Mr. Lincoln did not put an end to zone postal charges upon second-class mail. There were no such zone charges in effect at the time of his inauguration and had not been for a period of about nine years. There is absolutely no record to be found anywhere to indicate that Mr. Lincoln was opposed to zone charges on second-class mail.

In regard to your reference to President Wilson's statement when governor of New Jersey, permit me to suggest that I believe you are also in error in saying that he condemned the zone system. Upon investigation of this matter I am unable to find any such statement from him. I am informed, however, that he did about that time condemn the proposal of the Post Office Department for a flat-rate increase of from 1 to 4 cents per pound. No zone system was contemplated at that time.

Believing that you desire to represent the facts as they exist, I respectfully request that you give the same publicity to this as was given to your editorial.

Very respectfully, J. J. MANSFIELD.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact that this special rate of 1 cent per copy was made on magazines for our soldiers in France, as authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This rate was not intended for the publishers, but its purpose was to induce the people generally to send over their surplus supplies of reading matter. Thousands of copies of magazines were procured by the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, Salvation Army, and other societies and sent under this special rate. The purchases referred to in Leslie's editorial, if sent at all, were doubtless sent in that manner, or, at least, would have been sent that way if the Young Men's Christian Association had received any intimation whatever that there was an attempt to hold it up for $7,000 additional in order to form a basis for political propaganda.

This editorial appeared in Leslie's Weekly of March 1, 1919. Printed circulars and form letters containing the same statement had previously been sent out by the director of the Magazine Trust. I have here a circular entitled "Chapter VI," received in the month of January and a mimeograph print bearing date February 1, 1919, in which the same statements appear. In fact, the author of this literature was unquestionably also the writer of the editorial in Leslie's Weekly, as they all have the same earmarks. Knowing that the propaganda was impossible of being true, I wrote to the Young Men's Christian Association headquarters to get their version of it, and I will read in this connection the reply which I received:

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION,
TREASURER'S OFFICE,
February 8, 1919.

Hon. J. J. MANSFIELD, M. C.,
Room 159, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of February 4 addressed to headquarters Young Men's Christian Association, Washington, has been referred to this office for our attention. A careful inquiry in the office of the comptroller of the war work council does not reveal any apparent overcharge by any magazine publishers because of postal rates. The overseas purchasing department of our organization advises me that the magazine publishers with whom we dealt have been extremely courteous, and have in all cases made their subscription prices so low that no one in our organization would be justified in making any criticism regarding the postal charges. In fact, their price reductions have more than offset the increased postal charges because of the law which went into effect July 1, 1918.

This is the first time this subject has been brought to our attention, and we were entirely unaware at headquarters that any such statement was being made in our name. Purchases of our supplies in this country are made through the six military departments into which our organization is divided, and it is more than unlikely that any purchase in any one department would be large enough to come under the description in the first paragraph of your letter.

No one has been authorized to make any statement of such a character in behalf of the Young Men's Christian Association, nor is anyone justified in making such a statement.

Very truly, yours, CHAS. H. BURR,
Assistant Deputy Treasurer.

Mr. Chairman, by evidence unimpeachable I will now show the effect that was produced by this remarkable campaign of propaganda. It may not have been the effect intended by its authors, perhaps, but the effect that actually resulted. I say the evidence is unimpeachable for the reason that it is furnished by the enemies of the zone law—the publishers of the metropolitan press—and they, like Brutus, are "all honorable men."

Bear in mind the country was circularized with this propaganda on February 1, 1919. On March 1, 1919, it was reproduced in the editorial columns of Leslie's and other periodicals. The effect was that it frightened the people and practically stopped the shipments of magazines to our soldiers overseas. You will observe that in this propaganda the term "penalty postage" was used. This of itself sounded like a bugbear, as the term "penalty" refers to retribution for crimes committed and the people naturally thought they were about to get into trouble and might have heavy penalties to pay.

Now, I will show by contemporaneous press dispatches that just 29 days after this propaganda appeared in the magazines, and just 1 month and 29 days after it was sent out over the country in circular form by the director general of the Magazine Trust, Gen. Pershing felt it his duty to appeal to the National Red Cross for more reading matter for our discontented soldiers at the front, stating that they were then in need of it as never before. I offer here a press report from the Washington Star of March 30, 1919, which is as follows:

PERSHING ASKS MAGAZINES FOR OVERSEAS ARMY.

WASHINGTON, March 29.

The boys overseas are asking for more reading matter. Gen. Pershing to-night cabled the request that more magazines be sent to the Americans on duty in France and in other countries in Europe. The general says the boys need interesting reading matter as never before.

The supply of magazines has been reduced from 10 to 2 tons a month, due to misapprehension of the public that magazines could not be sent under the 1-cent postage ruling, it was stated. Some magazines inadvertently dropped the line announcing that publications would be carried overseas under a 1-cent stamp. The ruling is still in force and magazines are being asked by the Post Office Department to print it again in the upper right-hand corner of their first page.

Red Cross divisions and chapters will be urged to stimulate renewed interest in the sending of magazines abroad by acquainting the public with the fact that the 1-cent privilege still exists; and also to dwell upon the statement of Gen. Pershing that the American Expeditionary Forces, with the excitement of fighting campaigns gone, are greatly in need of interesting reading while waiting for the day when they will receive word they are to be sent home.

I will also offer an Associated Press dispatch of the same date, as follows:

SEND MORE READING MATTER, PERSHING CABLES RED CROSS.

WASHINGTON, March 29.

Gen. Pershing has cabled a call for more reading matter for the soldiers overseas. He says it is needed now more than ever.

Transmitting the call Saturday to its divisions and chapters, the American Red Cross called attention to the fact that a 1-cent stamp pasted upon the cover still will take a magazine to a member of the Expeditionary Force.

It will be observed from these press dispatches that at the time the magazines were conducting this propaganda they also stopped printing on the upper right-hand corner of the first page the line announcing that a 1-cent stamp would carry that magazine to the boys in the trenches. This was an inadvertence, of course, but at the same time it would not have been consistent for the magazines to have continued printing this announcement and in the same number proclaim editorially that even the great religious societies of the country were being required to pay penalties on sending such magazines to France.

Mr. Chairman, at the time of this propaganda our soldier boys were bivouacked upon the fields of desolation. Every object of their environment was a grim reminder of the great struggle with death, desperation, and destruction through which they had just passed. Mentally and physically many of them had all but reached the limit of human endurance and come to "the parting of the ways." Interesting reading matter was the thing most calculated to divert their minds and relieve the strain upon their nervous systems. No one knew this better than that experienced soldier, the gallant Pershing. On account of this propaganda carried on for political effect to perpetuate a great subsidy to a few people, there was a shortage of reading matter for several months at a time when it was most needed. But for this propaganda there might now be fewer graves in France and more vacant space in the hospitals and asylums of this country, to say nothing of the mental and physical suffering that might have been averted.

Against those who contrived this scheme of propaganda I shall say nothing. God knows they already have enough to answer for. Unless their hearts and minds be as adamant they are now being lashed with the cat-o-nine-tails of their own conscious retribution, from which there can be no escape, and compared to which no other known torture is half so intense. "May the Lord have mercy on their souls."

OH, CONSISTENCY! THOU ART A JEWEL.

For the purpose of showing the inconsistency of Leslie's, I will quote from another editorial of that publication. The editorial of March 1 said that the Young Men's Christian Association was penalized in postage paid on magazines to France because France was in the eighth postal zone. On August 16, just five and one-half months later, it states that magazines can be sent to the "farthest end of India" for less postage than that required to take them to an adjoining State. I will read the extract from the editorial in Leslie's of August 16, 1919, as follows:

REPEAL AN UNJUST LAW.

One of the best acts of the present Congress will be to do away with the zone system, which imposes eight separate postal rates upon newspapers and periodicals. It will then follow in the steps of Lincoln, who abolished the system many years ago, and be in line with Mr. Wilson's condemnation of it when governor of New Jersey and the conclusion of Mr. Hughes when he made the postal investigation for Congress.

Senator SMOOT presented the situation in concrete form recently when he said: "I feel mortified as a citizen of the United States when I am told that from my own State a magazine can be sent to the farthest end of India for less money than it can be sent from my State to an adjoining State."

That, gentlemen, is consistency with a vengeance. A child who has studied geography will be hard to convince that the "farthest end of India" is nearer to us than our soldiers when in France. If placed in parallel columns, each of these editorials would answer the other, but Leslie's carried them five and one-half months apart. The first was intended to deceive and influence one class of readers against the zone law; the other to deceive and influence another class of readers. Mr. Leslie refused to publish my answer to his editorial of March 1, and I will now let him answer it in his own words of August 16.

Mr. Chairman, we hear a great deal said about "sectionalism" and "provincialism" in the discussion of this question. It is contended that if the great magazines are forced by the "zone" postal charges to limit their circulation to the near-by zones, other magazines will spring up in other sections of the country, each proclaiming an idea peculiar to its environment. That, as a result, the country will soon be divided into sections and zones of thought, and there will develop a New England view, a New York view, a Mississippi Valley view, a Southern view, and a Western view, and so forth. The claim is made that by returning to the flat rate the New York magazines will circulate throughout every section of the country and mold the people into one homogeneous mass, with but one thought and one idea, and thereby become an ideal Nation, one and indivisible.

Mr. Chairman, continental United States extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans, and from Canada to Mexico. It covers a wide expanse of territory, and embraces a population estimated at more than 100,000,000 people, supposed to be ordinarily intelligent and reasonably well informed. I am not one of those who believe that it is a dangerous thing for magazines to be published amongst such people in every zone and section of the country, setting forth the honest views of the people of those sections. I submit, sir, that the welfare of this Nation is in far greater peril when all the magazines are published in one section and reflect but a single thought and a single idea, and that the thought and idea of a very few men whose power, prestige, and pecuniary interests are involved.

Not only are all the magazines at present published in one section of the country, but practically all the great metropolitan periodicals are now published in two cities of that section, and their editorial policies are dominated by not more than 18 men of those two cities. Those men, from their viewpoint, constitute America. The 110,000,000 residing throughout the country compose the provinces. The view of the 18 is the American view. The views of the 110,000,000 are "provincial" and "sectional" views. Gentlemen, we have all heard of the "tail wagging the dog," but such gall as this, sirs, is the equivalent of the last vertebral joint of the caudal appendage wagging the American lion.

I have here copy of an editorial from the Quincy Journal, Quincy, Ill., which very aptly expresses its views upon this question. It reads as follows:

MAGAZINE PROPAGANDA.

To curb national circulations, declare the publishers of large magazines, is to curb public opinion. Meaning, likely, that the people of America are fools and that they must read the great and wise rot written by men in New York easy chairs before they can form a notion of what is what in the world.

Therefore, as the people of America comprise a great collection of mollycoddles and knownothings, the zone-rate postal plan must be repealed. The people must have the opportunity to be told by the big publishers what is good for them and what they should and should not do.

The people of our State, for instance, are not capable of forming their own opinions without aid from New York! Magazines must be circulated among the people of Quincy, or Quincy finds herself provincial and unable to steer a straight course on the sea of national patriotism!

The propaganda of the big publishers against the zone-rate system is a downright insult to the intelligent people of this country. It is insulting to tell any man that he hasn't sense enough to form his own opinion.

Magazines would repeal the "zone" law because it curbs public opinion, forsooth. Yet the sane and just man knows that the zone-rate law is the greatest thing for public opinion in the world, for it guards your home newspapers. It makes possible the more complete circulation of periodicals that are right in the field and know home conditions.

The home newspaper knows that its people have intelligence. The national magazine contends that they have not until the magazine has imparted some of its own superintelligence to them.

To repeal the zone-rate system will tend to drive the home newspaper down because of the great money that is behind the Magazine Trust. The sincere man will find himself strong against any plan to repeal the zone-rate postal law.

Mr. Chairman, this alleged argument that the "zone" postal rates on periodicals will produce "sectionalism" in this country is far-fetched indeed. I submit, sir, that exactly the opposite of this contention is true. It is the old cheap flat rate that produced "sectionalism," and sectionalism of the most damaging type. As developed under our third of a century experience with that system, practically all the magazines are published in one city, or within the first postal zone of that city; and, taking as true the statement of the publishers that the publication reflects the views of its environment rather than of the country at large, then, according to the logic of the publishers, all magazines being published under the same environment, they of course reflect the same views, the views peculiar to that particular section—"provincialisms," if you please. Not only are the "provincialisms" of a single section forced upon the country at large, but, sirs, it is the viewpoint of a very few men of that one section, a mere "baker's dozen," which we are forced to accept, because there is no other forum for the expression of a different view.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a statement from the Federal Trade Commission furnished me on May 1, 1919, showing location and daily capacity of the mills of the United States engaged in the manufacture of newsprint paper. From this statement it will appear that the combined daily capacity of the mills was approximately 4,580 tons, 70 per cent of which was produced within the first and second postal zones of New York City. I am also informed that the freight rate on paper from New York to points in southern Texas, in lots less than carloads, is $1.65 per hundred pounds, and that practically all the paper used in that section comes from New York. While the Texas publisher was paying $1.65 per hundred on his blank paper from New York, the New York publisher was sending his printed paper to Texas through the mail at only $1 per hundred pounds. The paper for the Texas publisher was going at slow freight, on which he was paying the cost of transportation plus a profit to the carrier, while the paper of the New York publisher was going on fast passenger train, on which he was paying one-eighth the actual cost, and the people of the United States were being taxed to pay the other seven-eighths for him.

The law still permits the New York magazine publisher to send the literary portion of his magazine to any section of the country at the same price the local publisher must pay, but on the portion that is devoted to business advertisements he is required under the zone law to pay in proportion to the distance carried. This will eventually result in causing magazines to be published in other sections of the country, and in the saving to the taxpayers of many millions of dollars annually.

Mr. Chairman, the Government has been receiving approximately 84 cents per pound in handling letters, $1.67 per pound in handling postal cards, and 1 cent per pound in handling magazines and newspapers. Parcel post has always been under a zone system, and paid for in proportion to weight and distance carried. The postage paid on letters and postal cards amounts to far more than the cost to the Government in handling them, that paid on parcel post is sufficient to cover the cost, but that paid on magazines and newspapers was sufficient to pay only about one-eighth the actual cost to the Government in handling them. Under the present law publishers are required to pay in proportion to the distance carried on that portion of the publication which is devoted to advertising matter, the receipts from which will be increased annually from four to five million dollars for a period of four years from the time the law went into effect. What Congress should now do, in my judgment, is to reduce the postage on letters in proportion to the increased amounts received from newspapers and magazines. To do this, we should first reduce the postage on drop letters to 1 cent, and later to be applied to all letters of 1 ounce and under.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the power that was given under the flat postal rate to a few publishers to virtually dictate what the American people should be permitted to read, carrying with it the power to misrepresent and suppress facts and to control the affairs of our Government, the power to make and unmake men and measures at will, constitutes the most serious menace with which our country could possibly be confronted. Compared to it the great loss to our Government in dollars and cents in handling that class of mail is but incidental. But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the heavy loss is only incidental, yet it should be borne in mind that the major portion of it went as a subsidy, pure and simple, handed upon a silver platter to only a few of the wealthiest men of this country and paid by the taxpayers of the American Nation—paid by those who wrote letters; paid by the man of business; paid by those following the trades and who practiced the professions; paid by those who tilled the soil and turned the spindles; paid by the wage earner, who should ever be worthy of his hire; paid by the little girl when she penned a line to buddy in the trenches; paid, if you please, by the sorrowing widow in acknowledging the receipt of her allowance, left her, perhaps, by an only son who upon the soil of France paid the penalty of his greatness by making the supreme sacrifice for the honor and glory of his country and for the cause of humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to take this occasion to enter my solemn protest against the propaganda which for some time has been energetically and systematically carried on by the local board of trade and chamber of commerce to bring manufacturing establishments to the National Capital. While manufacturing establishments are useful and necessary and should be encouraged yet there are appropriate places for their location and some places which are not appropriate, and I do not believe that the National Capital should be developed into an industrial center. [Applause.] We have for some time been reading articles in the local papers stating the activities of those organizations along this line. A very recent article appearing in the Washington Post is as follows:

RUSH TO OBTAIN FACTORY SITES—TRADE BODIES NOW GETTING SCORES OF REQUESTS FROM OUT-OF-TOWN CONCERNS.

With the movement to establish light manufacturing concerns in this city constantly growing, industry here is being rapidly augmented. While the local trade bodies are doing everything in their power to encourage light manufacturing here, their efforts are always directed to doing so without impairing the beauty of the city.

Scores of requests for assistance are being received from factories which wish to locate here by the industrial interests committee of the Washington Board of Trade and the manufacturing committee of the chamber of commerce. So many requests have come to Isaac Gans, chairman of the industrial interests committee, that he stated last night that it looked "like the beginning of an intensive campaign for light manufacturing in the District."

A large hosiery mill, of New York and Philadelphia, which wishes to locate here, is now being investigated. A communication has also been received from J. J. Donohue now conducting a chain of stores, who is desirous of establishing a shoe manufacturing plant in the city.

This movement was instituted by those two organizations, and they have been working assiduously upon it, with the result indicated in the article from which I have just read. The District of Columbia was practically carved out of a wilderness and set apart specifically for the site of our National Capital.

This city has sprung up solely because it was the National Capital, and I take the position that everything else should be subordinated to making it a proper and beautiful seat of National Government. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. The greatest wonder to me is that every manufacturer and every rich man in the United States does not come here, with taxes at 1½ per cent, intangible assets at three-tenths of 1 per cent, with cheap water and cheap lights, and half of the expense paid by the people of the United States. It is a wonder that they do not all come here.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. One reason for my protest is that if these things be brought to the attention of manufacturing establishments, as is now being done, that will be the result—they will flock here in great numbers.

Although many merchants and other business men in Washington seem to be obsessed with the idea that this Capital was established and is being maintained at Government expense for their especial benefit, yet, as a matter of fact, every man, woman, and child of this Republic has an interest in the National Capital, as they and their ancestors have made it what it is. It is not only the seat of government, the official home of the Chief Executive and his Cabinet, the Congress, the Supreme Court, and the various other departments of Government—the official home of more than 100,000 Government officials and employees—but it is also the official residence of the numerous diplomatic representatives from foreign countries who are accredited to this country. The various officials, together with their families, doubtless constitute at least one-third of the population of the city of Washington. Tens of thousands of others have made their home here because of the beauties and attractions of the National Capital. Because of the presence here of the classes enumerated, and in order to live and thrive upon them, the merchants, tradesmen, professional men, and various others have congregated here; they are incidental and corollary to the presence of the classes first named. Many of them are patriotic citizens who have a just pride in the National Capital, but many of them have no pride whatever in the beautification of this city, but are here for all they can get out of it; and, unfortunately, the latter kind seems to have been in the majority in the board of trade and chamber of commerce at the time the movement under discussion was instituted.

Having apparently grown greedier than ever because of the war profits which they have been reaping, and apparently having in mind the fact that industrial workers are now receiving large wages, they are now looking to them for new and profitable "picking," and are consequently endeavoring to bring as many of them as possible into their midst in order that they may likewise prey upon them. I can understand, in a way, why such individuals, with no interest or motive other than to greedily fill their own coffers, should be willing to promote such a movement, even though it would result in impairing, if not destroying, the beauty of the National Capital, yet are we, as the representatives of all the people, to supinely permit such a program to be carried out? Are we to stand for the policy promulgated by these barnacles on the ship of state, these greedy leeches on the national body politic, unwilling to pay their just share of taxes but always clamoring for governmental appropriations, not because of their interest in the National Government but in order that they themselves may profit therefrom? They ingeniously give out the information that they are endeavoring to bring to Washington only "light manufacturing plants," but the article which I read speaks of "a large hosiery mill" and "a shoe manufacturing plant." Furthermore, such a program once entered upon, where and by whom would any line of demarcation be drawn?

In my opinion, Washington is already amply large for the seat of National Government, and any increase of population will still further increase the cost of living for the Government employees and thereby result in the necessity of paying them larger salaries than would otherwise be the case. An increase in population would render more difficult the already difficult housing situation; it would increase the competition for all the necessities of life, which, of course, would be very desirable from the standpoint of the class referred to, but it would be very unfortunate for the Government officials and other consumers.

We all know that, as useful and necessary as are factories, there inevitably go with them smoke and grime and dust and noise. If Washington is permitted to develop into a manufacturing center, we shudder at the contemplation f the effect which would be had upon the many beautiful public buildings and monuments located here. The trees, shrubs, flowers, and grass which now grow so luxuriantly in Washington would be greatly injured by the smoke and dust from the manufactories. It would cease to be the cleanest city in the country, and would become smoke-besmirched, like most other cities.

The Nation has a tremendous investment in the city of Washington. More has been spent upon our Government buildings in an effort to make them buildings of architectural beauty and symmetry than would have perhaps been necessary from a practical standpoint alone. This Government has spent millions and millions of dollars in an effort to beautify this city and it has been beautified to the extent that it is perhaps the most beautiful city in the country, if not in the world.

On the very page of the same paper from which I read the first article there appears another article, the headlines of which are, "Zone expert here." "Will beautify city," and then the article mentions the fact that Congress had made a special appropriation for this official and that he is now here studying the problem with a view of making more beautiful this already beautiful city. We have a Fine Arts Commission, which, at Government expense, is devoting all of its time to considering and devising plans by which the capital may be made more beautiful. I understand that the Fine Arts Commission has formulated a very comprehensive plan, providing for the construction of additional buildings, parks, driveways, and other improvements, designed to beautify the city of Washington, which improvements are expected to extend over a long period of years and to involve an immense expenditure. And yet, in spite of the pride of Nation, and of the vast national expenditures made and contemplated, with a view of making Washington the most beautiful city in the world, the local interests referred to have deliberately and selfishly entered upon a movement to counteract and nullify these efforts on the part of the National Government to beautify and keep beautiful the National Capital.

Because of my deep and abiding interest in my country and its Capital, and because of my profound contempt for blind greed, I submit these thoughts, with the hope of something effective being done to prevent the execution of the program to which I refer. I submit the matter for the consideration of the Fine Arts Commission, the District Commissioners, and the Members of this House, particularly those who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

I am in full sympathy with the efforts which have been made, are still being made, and which will doubtless be made in the future to make and preserve the unrivaled beauties and attractions of our National Capital. If it is not already so, I think we should make it the most beautiful city in all the world—one in which every American citizen can take a just pride; one which will be viewed with admiration and wonder by every foreign visitor.

The city of Washington should be zealously maintained, strictly and solely, as and for the seat of the National Government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, a matter of the deepest concern to us all is that of keeping well and fit for the daily tasks of life. The conditions under which we work here are not of the best, so far as they relate to health and hygiene. The air in this Chamber at its best is not of the purest, and often it is most vile, so that we know how hard it is to endure it throughout a long day's work. Aside from a walk to the Capitol in the morning by those of us who can not afford an automobile, we have no opportunities for exercise. The gymnastic apparatus for athletic exercise installed at the House Office Building within the last few weeks, paid for by private subscriptions from the Members of the House, indicates our desire to do something to help a bad situation.

What I have to say to-day is in regard to a man who has made a nation-wide reputation by his work and his teachings in the very important field of keeping the physical man fit for the duties of life. The name of this man is Walter Camp, who is widely known as an authority on matters pertaining to athletics. He is sometimes called the "father of football" in America, and is deserving of that honor; but, in my judgment, his greatest claim to distinction is the service he has rendered in aiding, encouraging, and urging the spread of the gospel of keeping men physically fit. He is my constituent, neighbor, and personal friend. We know him at home as a big business man. He is the president and active head of a big manufacturing concern, the New Haven Clock Co., but he is many other things as well. As I have said, most people in the United States know him as an authority on athletics and as a great exponent of physical training.

Just prior to our entry into the war Mr. Camp began with a group of men above 45 years of age, mostly his friends and neighbors, to demonstrate what could be done within a minimum of time toward putting men of this type into condition for the work of a period of stress and strain. The experiment was a great success. He came to Washington early in the war in order to give the benefit of his knowledge and experience to a number of Government officials, including Cabinet officers, ambassadors, assistant secretaries, commissioners, bureau chiefs, and others. Again his work proved a great success in making those men fit for the heavy duties that were falling upon them at the time. He developed by careful study and experiment a system of daily setting-up exercises, simple but most effective, to be taken in the morning immediately after rising or at night before going to bed, or both. He claimed no miraculous efficacy for the particular exercises recommended by him, but he knew that they were based upon correct principles and that if properly taken would prove helpful. He reduced the number of exercises to 12 and called the combination the "daily dozen." His enthusiasm for the "daily dozen" was irresistible. Others who tried the exercises became enthusiastic, and so the name and the fame of the "daily dozen" spread until it is probably a conservative estimate to say that a million of people have tried them in this country.

A little over two years ago in some remarks on the floor I referred to the "daily dozen" and Mr. Camp's work in connection with making and keeping men fit for their tasks both before and during the war. Those remarks, with a liberal extension of the remarks of Mr. Camp and others, were printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and later in pamphlet form. Some of my speeches, especially in connection with munitions, had a very gratifying popularity during the war, but I am compelled to say that no speech of my own has ever had any such popularity as the "daily dozen" speech had. Thirty thousand copies of that speech have been printed, and upon requests which have streamed into my office for two years all of these speeches have been sent out, going into practically every State of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may now extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing what may be properly called a sequel to my remarks of March 28, 1918. The extension will indicate something of the results of Mr. Camp's work during the war and since the war along the same lines of keeping men well and fit for service, whether the service be in war or in peace. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. "The daily dozen!"—a rather strange name—but it was well described by Lawrence Perry in the New York Evening Post when he referred to it as "a shorthand system of setting-up exercises." It came into being in a singular way, too, for it was developed during the war time to answer the need of training camps in the naval stations. A commandant, a rear admiral, sent a letter to Mr. Camp saying that he was about to throw out all set-up exercises from his district as they either tired his men out so that they were for a time unfit for strenuous drill, or they taught them to slack because they saw the opportunities of avoiding the actual proper performance of the exercises. So the "daily dozen" was developed—short in period of time occupied, avoiding the difficulty of boring the men too much, and consisting, instead of vigorous muscular effort, in a suppling and stretching of the large muscles and a lifting up of the thoracic cage.

In addition to his services to the Navy, Mr. Camp has acted as consultant to the Surgeon General in matters regarding the physical fitness of aviators, and placed some 40 trainers in aviation fields. His "daily dozen" was introduced in many of these fields and with excellent results.

Mr. Camp insists and reiterates that the object of these exercises is not to build up big muscles or to tax the strength, but to produce a sense of physical well-being. The time required in taking them is so limited that they are not taxing in any sense, but are simply pleasurable and exhilarating, even without regard to the healthful effect produced. The exercises are for the most part directed toward the improvement of the trunk rather than of the limbs. The trunk contains the vital organs. It is like the engine in a motor car. It is here that the organic and functional activities are carried on. It is here that the breathing is done. It is here that the heart operates and the whole digestive tract functions. It is here that the faulty carriage of the body begins, and it is here that bad habits and excesses make themselves felt.

When the breathing is proper, when the operations of digestion are going on normally, when the heart is functioning as it should, one may be assured that he is traveling in the direction of health, and it is along this line that these exercises are directed.

One purpose is to produce an erect carriage, but it is also desirable to secure what comes with the erect carriage, namely, the straightening of the spine, the lifting of the whole thoracic upper body, the easy spread of the ribs, and the pliability of the diaphragm. The average man who does not intend to be a weight lifter or to pose as a muscular prodigy has no need of the enormous biceps or big bulging calves.

If the shoulder muscles are well developed, the back a strong column, as it should be, and the body performs its functions, the man assumes a natural position and does not need to think about it or make an effort to do so. In these exercises he stretches his body upward, thereby raising the ribs and, naturally but not in an enforced way, straightening the abdomen. If there be a feeling of sluggishness, it is dispelled and a sense of exhilaration replaces it. The circulation is steadied rather than increased and he is not tired. The muscles of the back are exercised in various directions, and gradually the man becomes firm in a correct poise, for by the development of the muscles of the body he has placed an elastic muscular corset around himself. By the breathing exercises he lifts and flattens out the ribs and broadens the base, thus giving exercise to the deep muscles in the back and preventing any liability to strain there.

It should be borne constantly in mind that there should be no attempt in these exercises to make any extraordinary muscular effort. The purpose is to get the muscles well under control and cause an increased circulation of the blood, but not that which comes from violent exercise. What is desired is a more generous distribution of work to all the muscles and cells and to provide that when the more violent exercise comes the muscles are the better prepared for it. It is best to rely upon a man's playtime, or, if he has strenuous physical work, upon that, to increase the heart action rather than to make any attempt to do it through set-up exercises. A thing to be avoided particularly is making the man muscle bound. Instead of this the effort should be to increase his reach and pliability, for just as soon as this is accomplished through the medium of these stretching exercises there is created a desire for exercise as a sport and a feeling of confidence in one's own strength.

Mr. Camp would not dream of detracting from the splendid work of Mueller, Sandow, Checkley, Hebert, and many others, and would in no way minimize their credit. He lays claim to no inventions. In fact, he tells us that we shall find that the East Indians long before our fathers or grandfathers were born practiced most of these body stretching and stimulating exercises. The difficulty has long been to get men to do them. If the combinations, descriptive nomenclature, and reduction in time accomplished by Mr. Camp seem new enough to induce more people to follow the road to health, it will be well for them and for future generations. If you practice daily all the Mueller exercises, or those of any other man who does not ask you to develop bulging muscles or to use up the vitality needed in your daily work, you are to be congratulated upon your wisdom and pertinacity. Perhaps you have the courage also to wear sandals. Dr. Kneipp went before and further than Mueller in that way. The ones to whom these words are addressed are probably of lesser tenacity.

During the entire period of the war Mr. Camp was a very busy man because his advice and assistance were sought far and wide by those responsible for the physical training of men in the military service. After developing these exercises in various parts of the service the call among the civilian population became so marked that he arranged the "daily dozen" in such fashion as to make it simple and easy for leaders in industrial plants and still further to make it adaptable for every individual even without a leader. Here is the simple set of exercises which everyone can follow at the expenditure of only six or seven minutes a day:

Each exercise starts from the position of attention, heels 4 inches apart, feet turned nearly straight ahead, body erect on hips and inclined a little forward, shoulders square and even, arms hanging naturally. Each movement should be slow and measured; guard against a tendency to hurry or to be careless. The three preliminary exercises are very simple: First, raise the arms to a horizontal position, then straight above the head; slowly lower them again. Second, raise the arms and, forcing the elbows back, place the hands on the hips; then lower them to the sides. Third, raise the arms once more and, again forcing back the elbows, touch the finger tips at the back of the neck. Repeat each of these movements several times.

Fourth exercise: Raise the arms sidewise to horizontal position; turn the palms upward and force the arms back as far as possible; while in this position count slowly from 1 to 10, and at each count describe a complete circle about 12 inches in diameter, the arms remaining stiff and pivoting from the shoulders. Then reverse the direction of the circle and do another 10 of them.

Fifth exercise: Raise the arms as before to horizontal. Then, while taking a deep breath, raise the arms to an angle of 45 degrees, and also raise the heels until you are resting on the balls of the feet. Then, while you slowly let out the breath, come back to the original position, feet flat on the floor, arms horizontal. Be careful not to raise the arms more than 45 degrees or return them to below horizontal. Do this 10 times.

Sixth exercise: Raise the arms as before to horizontal. Place the hands behind the neck, index fingers touching, elbows forced back. While in this position bend the body slowly forward from the waist as far as possible. Return to upright position and bend backward only a little way. Do not make these movements jerky and do not hurry through them. Repeat the whole movement, bending forward, then straightening up, then bending backward, five times.

Seventh exercise: Raise the arms as before to horizontal. Turn the left palm upward; then raise the left arm and lower the right until the right is down close to the side and the left is straight up overhead. Then slowly bend the body sidewise from the waist, the right arm slipping down the right leg to or below the knee and the left arm bending in a half circle downward over the head until the fingers touch the right ear. Return to the original position and go down the other way, the left arm slipping along the left leg, the right arm bending downward in a half circle over the left ear. Do this five times.

Eighth exercise: (a) Raise the arms as before to horizontal. Move the right foot 12 inches from the left. Slowly bend the fists and lower the arms downward from the elbows. Then curl the fists upward into the armpits, bending the head backward meanwhile until you look upward at the ceiling. Take a deep breath as you bend the head back and begin to let it out as you come back to the original position, head erect, arms at horizontal. (b) Then, without resting, extend the arms straight forward from the shoulders, palms down; let the arms begin to fall and the body to bend forward from the waist, head up, eyes to the front, until the body has reached the limit of motion and the arms have passed the sides and been forced back and up as far as possible, finishing in expiration. A deep, slow breath should be taken as you go up and exhaled slowly as you come down. Do the whole exercise—(a) and (b)—five times.

Ninth exercise: Move the right foot until the heels are about 12 inches apart. Raise the arms to horizontal. Bend the knees and, with the weight on the toes, lower the body almost to the heels, keeping the trunk as nearly erect as possible. Do this 10 times.

Tenth exercise: Raise the arms as before to horizontal. Stretch the arms straight above the head, fingers interlocked, arms touching the ears. Then, with the fingers still interlocked, describe a complete circle about 24 inches in diameter, the body bending only at the waist. Do this five times; then repeat the movement five times, but in the opposite direction. Go through the entire movement slowly and steadily, bending the body in its rotation as far as possible from the hips only.

Eleventh exercise: (a) Move the right foot until the heels are 12 inches apart. Raise the arms to horizontal and turn the body to the left from the hips, the arms remaining horizontal until the face is to the left, the right arm pointing straight forward and the left arm straight backward. (b) While in this position bend the body from the waist, so that the right arm goes down until the right fingers touch the floor midway between the feet and the left arm goes up. The right knee must be slightly bent to accomplish this. Reverse the movement, turning the body to the right this time until the left hand points straight forward, then bending downward until the fingers of the left hand touch the floor. Return each time to the original position, body erect, arms horizontal. After you have mastered the exercise you can go through it—(a) and (b)—in one continuous motion. Repeat the whole—(a) and (b)—first to the right, then to the left, 10 times.

Twelfth exercise: Raise the arms to horizontal, then upward, at the same time inhaling, until they are straight overhead; then let them fall forward and downward while the body bends forward from the waist, letting out the breath, and the arms have passed the sides and been forced upward and backward as far as possible, just as in exercise 5. Remember, as you bend forward, to keep the head up and the eyes to the front. Straighten the body upright, with the arms overhead; then lower the arms to the horizontal position with the palms turned upward and the arms and shoulders forced hard back; then raise the arms upward and begin the movement again. Repeat this entire movement slowly five times, forcing the air out of the lungs as the body bends forward and filling the lungs again as the body straightens.

Since the armistice the "daily dozen" has spread more and more widely through civilian bodies, and especially where most needed, among the busy executives in large organizations. These have included Wanamaker's, Colgate & Co., Swift & Co., Cheney Bros., and many others. It has been taken up by many clubs, whose members have profited greatly from its practice. It is so simple and yet so effective that it has replaced many of the old forms. Just a few letters taken at random from the thousands received show something of the results accomplished and explain the increasing demand for the system:

PHILADELPHIA, May 8, 1918.

MR. WALTER CAMP,
Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

DEAR MR. CAMP: I can not tell you the impression your talk of two weeks ago has made upon our people here in the store. So much so that, with your permission, we intend to adopt your system for the entire "Store Family," both in New York and Philadelphia, from the owners down.

Now, would it be possible for us to send our athletic director to one of the camps under your control, in order that he may spend two or three days there and get a thorough idea of your system, so that he can come back to us and carry on the work? Could you let us have photographs of the different movements, both men and women, and would you permit us to reprint them, so that everyone in our employ could have a copy?

We would like to send our athletic director to any point you mention during the early part of next week.

Again thanking you for what you have done, and awaiting the pleasure of your early reply, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

SAMUEL J. DALLAS.

NEW YORK, September 12, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Some time ago we sent you a card of exercises prepared by Walter Camp. We have had a number of appreciative letters, a few of which we quote:

"My breathing has become more regular and easier and I have a different feeling in the morning after the exercises."

"The boys who are traveling should follow these instructions faithfully. The continual change in water, food, and beds makes it most necessary to keep their physical condition good. A little exercise each morning has been of great value to me. Keep after the boys along this line. It's good stuff."

"The ——— Division has taken great interest in the illustrated and instructive cards as issued on 'Keeping fit,' and I am free to say our force has been benefited by the card suggestion."

Last April the New York Tribune published an article attributing Clemenceau's energy to his daily exercise. Article ran in part as follows:

"Premier Clemenceau's wonderful constitution is ascribed partly to the fact that he devotes half an hour every morning to physical exercise. At 8 o'clock Edouard Leroy, his gymnastic master, arrives to put him through a series of movements, demanding the greatest flexibility in all parts of the body.

"For years the premier has not missed his morning drill, except for a few days after the attempt made to assassinate him by Cottin, but he resumed it as soon as it was safe to do so.

"It is to this daily exercise that M. Clemenceau attributes his indefatigable energy. Even during the most anxious hours of the German offensive he conscientiously went through the drill and found that after a sleepless night it made him fit for the strenuous tasks of his office."

If you study these exercises carefully you will see that although you may walk a good deal and carry a grip, yet you are not developing in this way symmetrically the muscles of the trunk which are most helpful for maintaining health. The writer of this letter is not a young man and from experience he knows that health and vigor, both of mind and body, are gained by the faithful carrying out of these exercises, and he therefore commends them to you not for your careful consideration but for putting them into execution.

If for any reason you have mislaid your card of exercises we will forward you another upon notification.

Yours, very truly,

COLGATE & CO.

THOMAS COUNTY BOARD OF HEALTH,
Thomasville, Ga., July 16, 1919.

MR. WALTER CAMP,
New Haven, Conn.

DEAR MR. CAMP: Inclosed find indorsements of efficiency exercises. Beg pardon for the necessity of keeping them this long; showed them to several. Have mailed Mr. C. H. Rice copy of same. I have showed the "daily dozen" to twenty-five hundred school children in rural schools, but only 1,500 used them, hence my effort to get them in curriculum. Am using them daily myself; so is Mrs. Schreiber and the children and everyone that I can get to use them.

Am going over the situation, and in the meantime the school board of Boston, Ga., our second largest town in the county, have adopted them, and I am to teach them on the day of opening. If you never had done a thing but get out this "daily dozen," you will have accomplished a great work, full of benefit to all that will use them.

I speak to thousands of boys and girls as well as grown people every year on health subjects, and they all get news of the "daily dozen."

Many thanks, and God bless you.

JNO. SCHREIBER.

[On board S. S. George Washington at Brest.]

TO WALTER CAMP.

Your drill has been the test of us;
You've better made the best of us;
You've much improved the rest of us;
You've raised each sinking chest of us;
You've much reduced each vest of us;
You ever will be blest of us;
North, south, and east, and west of us;
Signed with the seal attest of us.

A. Brown, H. S. Amberg, A. H. Brown, E. B. Reed, M. Coolidge, Paul D. Moody, Preston Herbert, E. A. Schuman, and others.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., March 15, 1920.

DEAR WALTER CAMP: I have mastered the exercises quite well, I believe. I found that I could not get up early enough to do them justice in the morning, so I do them before I go to bed. They seem to work as well as the proverbial "patented medicine—take it in morning sure to waken you, take it at night sure sleep producer." The muscles get the same exercise so I don't think it matters much.

Thanking you very much for the attention you have shown, I will close.

Very truly, yours, F. B. V.

Now listen!

Up and down the streets, in the street cars, and the various places where people congregate how often we hear this expression.

So many people trying to impress on others something that has "taken hold" of them.

I would like to join the "now listen" exhorters. It is not our lack of knowledge so much as our lack of applying that knowledge that counts with the most of us.

A few months ago the American Magazine published an article, "Walter Camp's daily dozen set-up." I read it and thought, "Everybody for their hobby; it may be all right for people of sedentary habits, but for a busy housekeeper, who twists and turns at various tasks, it's very little they need it." However, the article interested me and I laid aside the magazine.

For a number of years I had been doing the various tasks which falls to the lot of the average woman who does all her own work, but I was not at my best as far as health goes. My circulation was very poor and I was "always tired." I finally realized I must find some way to overcome this condition or suffer a breakdown.

I finally decided to "take time" to try out "Walter Camp's daily dozen," and a few other things. I have been going through these exercises regularly and carefully every day before dressing or at bedtime. At the end of about 10 weeks I find:

I have a good circulation.

I am not "always tired."

I have filled out some unsightly hollows in my frame.

I have cured myself of a long-standing case of constipation.

I have gained 5 pounds in weight, and feel as though once more I had an intelligence, which I could use for the benefit of myself and others.

You might publish "Walter Camp's daily dozen" again. Maybe some one else would "wake up" to the possibilities of what intelligent exercise does for the body.

HELIOPOLIS, EGYPT, December 20, 1920.

Mr. WALTER CAMP,
The Senior Service Corps of New Haven, Conn., America.

DEAR MR. CAMP: The majority in Egypt have so neglected their health that the smallest village have some doctors, and the people seem to be lack of more.

Referring to your proposal in the Physical Culture, you have enlightened an obscure way of health and have opened my eyes.

Under your counsel I unhesitatingly and hastily formed a company of respectable middle-aged men, and have been elected secretary, undertaking to ocupy my whole spare time for that purpose. Meanwhile advising everyone to read at least the Physical Culture magazine.

Mr. Walter Camp will not only have taken part for the restoration of America but will also save Egypt.

I will be very much obliged if you will forward the necessary instructions and literature for organizing a branch in my locality.

Thanking those persons who help mankind, I am,

Faithfully, yours, I. KOGAN.

DURHAM, N. H., November 4, 1919.

DEAR WALTER: Where can I get some more illustrations of the "daily dozen"? My household has gone quite wild over the exercises, and my single copy, which you gave me, is overworked.

I am acquiring a suppleness of the back and knees the like of which has not been known for years.

Really, they are great.

My regards, please, to Mrs. Walter.

As ever, FRED T. MURPHY.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Mr. WALTER CAMP, New Haven, Conn.

DEAR SIR: In the American Magazine for March, 1919, I read an article describing your series of physical culture exercises, which I have been practicing ever since, going on now for about 10 months. And I want to say right here that they have done me more good in many ways than any exercises I have ever taken. I am like one of the men you describe, who, if he happens to get up late would rather miss his tub than his dozen set-ups.

I am 46 years young, have more pep than I had 20 years ago.

I write these few lines to express my appreciation, based on practical experience, of your system.

Yours, very truly, J. S. VAN DYKE.

COLLIER'S,
December 2, 1919.

DEAR MR. CAMP: "The daily dozen" booklet and picture came. Thank you very much. The two letters seem to me very interesting indeed.

I believe with you the need for increased personal efficiency to offset mounting prices and the indifference to work on the part of so many people, and that it can be exhilarated and maintained better through a few minutes each day devoted to the right kind of exercise than two months once a year could possibly do.

I would rather receive these intimate letters you receive from men who are better off for your having lived than to receive extra dividends from an investment in oil stocks.

Then, if there are any Camp children, they have got something to shoot at.

For most men know that too much money left youngsters is not always a good thing, but to leave them the consciousness that their forbears were regarded by their fellow citizens as regular men exerts a greater restraining influence when the youngster is tempted and has a lift to a healthy ambition that nothing else in this world has.

I don't want to have to wait until the next Army and Navy football game before seeing you again, so that when you are in town with some time on your hands, just tell me where you will be, and I will do all the leg work.

Sincerely, yours, GEORGE D. BUCKLEY.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1919.

WALTER CAMP, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR: I want to thank you for the propaganda you have been doing in connection with your setting-up bill. For four years I was a nervous wreck with collitis, rapid pulse, endless phobias, etc. After spending large sums on physicians, X ray, etc., I happened to see an article on your drill in Physical Culture, and later sent to the National Security League for the pamphlet.

Within 10 days after using your exercises I was able to go to Boston and take up my law business and have been at it ever since.

One queer thing is that other systems of exercise have bored me so I couldn't continue them, but yours I can't stop. I have distributed the pamphlet to many of my friends, who are enthusiastic.

Your exercises are, no doubt, good for a well man, but they are wonderful for a sick man.

Thanking you again for setting me on my feet, I am,

Very truly, yours,

PRESCOTT F. HALL.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
February 12, 1920.

Mr. WALTER CAMP,
New Haven, Conn.

DEAR WALTER CAMP:

"Who's better made the best of us
And much improved the rest of us."

Thank you for your note. I should like to see you twice every day and to "grind, grate, grasp, crawl, curl, crouch, weave, wave, and wing" for you; but better still, talk with you, as you propose.

My headquarters in New York are the Century Club, just around the corner from the Yale Club. Call me up there when you are in town and see if we can synchronize.

I wish very much to go to New Haven for the Parker memorial services next Sunday, but I am not sure that I can manage it.

Cordially, yours,

JOHN P. FINLEY.

Whereas the New Haven Chamber of Commerce has noted with pride the movement which was inaugurated by Mr. Walter Camp, of this city, of organizing groups or corps of men and women in every American community for the purpose of improving their physical condition, and thus promoting general physical fitness as a national asset, in the interest of the preparedness of the country; and

Whereas the National Security League has indorsed Mr. Camp's plan and has recommended to every American mayor that he appoint in his community a committee on physical reserve to investigate and consider introducing the movement in that community; and

Whereas this city, the home of Mr. Camp, was the first to form such a group and to endeavor to promote physical fitness throughout its organization: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New Haven Chamber of Commerce heartily indorse the scope and purpose of the plan of Mr. Walter Camp for national physical improvement as outlined by the National Security League; and be it

Resolved, That it urge upon the Chamber of Commerce of this country the investigation of the system, and that it recommend that the National Chamber of Commerce give its indorsement to the movement as a measure tending to promote the general efficiency and betterment of American people as a business as well as a health measure.

Here is what Miss Susanne Lenglen says, the champion woman tennis player, who, after winning on the Continent, carrying off the singles, doubles and mixed doubles, came to Wimbledon and in the blue-ribbon event of the year defeated Mrs. Lambert Chambers, who had held the British championship for some seven or eight years:

Why I don't think I have any particular method. I practice daily some simple physical culture exercises I was taught at school. Most French girls don't like that sort of thing, and drop such exercise as soon as possible, but it interested me to see my body develop, and oh, I felt so well, so I have kept them up. Really they are very simple, and I only give a few moments of my time to them. A quarter of an hour's practice every day will preserve one's more perfect condition of suppleness and freshness.

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell says:

All classes of men who use the brain severely, and who have also—and this is important—seasons of excessive anxiety or grave responsibility, are subject to the same form of disease; and this is why, I presume, that I, as well as others who are accustomed to encounter nervous disorders, have met with numerous instances of nervous exhaustion among merchants and manufacturers.

My notebooks seem to show that manufacturers and certain classes of railway officials are the most liable to suffer from neural exhaustion. Next to these come merchants in general, brokers, etc.; then, less frequently, clergymen; still less often, lawyers; and, more rarely, doctors; while distressing cases are apt to occur among the overschooled young of both sexes.

A prominent man in world affairs says:

Foolish people leave all sorts of things to time. Some leave the question of ill health to time.

Don't leave anything to Father Time. He won't do anything for you. He can't. All he does is to provide you room in which to perform. If you sit in the corner and wait for him to do your job, you'll be disappointed.

Father Time is only a sort of janitor in the employ of the Almighty. He sees the tenants come and go. But he has nothing to do with any of them, cares nothing about them. When you enter the arena he may bow and say, "Good morning." When you check out seventy or eighty years later he may say, "Good night." That, however, will be the extent of his interest in you, or knowledge of you. He sees billions pass in and out the gate.

The big executives of the present day and generation are not "checking out seventy or eighty years later." Unfortunately too many of those who ought to give of their best up to 60 and 70 are "checking out at 50," and some before that time. It is because they are leaving their health as a side issue and their job as precluding any attention being paid to their physical condition. Such men are not only "checking out" early but they lose power and ambition even before that. Their "push and punch" is gone. And one of the worst things that they do is to indulge in orgies of work and then orgies of exercise. A man has but one bowl of vitality, as it were, and from it he draws both for mental and physical work. If he thinks that by indulging in an orgy of exercise once a year or even once a week he can keep himself fit, he is entirely mistaken, and many a man at 50 or earlier has been suddenly awakened to this fact. Nature does not do things that way, and she exacts penalties from men who do. What is needed is a steady daily exercising of the main trunk of the body in order that that most important part, the "engine"—that is, the internal organs—may be kept in good order.

One of the very strong points in favor of Mr. Camp's simple set-up exercises seems to be their adaptability to men of all sizes and all weights. Fat men especially have found them helpful, and by their aid have either reduced weight or replaced fat with muscular tissue. Referring to stout persons, Dr. Eugene Lyman Fisk says:

A moderate degree of overweight is well borne before the age of 35. After the age of 35 overweight is associated with an increasingly high death rate, and at middle life it becomes a real menace to health. This is either because of its mere presence as a physical handicap or because of the faulty living habits that are often responsible for its development.

That is, a youthful figure as a rule reflects a superior vitality, other things being equal. Some allowance may be made for the type a man is, but not as much as he is inclined to think. For example, a massive man may be allowed a slight increase over the normal weight for his height, but when he comes to us to be examined, and we find him 25 to 40 pounds heavier than a slightly built man of the same age and height, we talk to him seriously.

Watch the scales. After the age of 35, 15 to 20 pounds overweight should prompt one to take careful measures for reducing. Habits should be formed that will keep the weight down automatically, instead of relying upon intermittent attempts that are more than likely to fail.

Walking, swimming, golf, billiards, hill climbing are all beneficial forms of exercise for the middle aged and overweight. Simple setting-up exercises, if repeated from twenty to forty times night and morning, will accomplish this. As the weight comes down, the exercise should be increased.

Most business men are overweight. You can tell that by looking at them. They are fat, plump, thick set, heavy. This surplus flesh is not merely a joke. It is a danger to health and longevity. No matter how well you feel, take steps to keep out of the class that life insurance companies have found to be undesirable as risks.

When Dr. Sargent, of Harvard University, made the charge a few years ago that "more than one-half of the male population between the ages of 18 and 45 years are unable to meet the health requirements of military service, and that of the largest and strongest of our country folk pouring into our cities barely one of their descendants ever attain to the third generation," it was a serious charge. We have become familiar with the forgetfulness of physical condition by men over 40, but we had prided ourselves, and not without better reason than Dr. Sargent would perhaps think or believe, that the majority of our youth would compare favorably with those of other countries. When one comes to sift the statement he should remember that a great many things for which the military examination might reject a man are not so serious after all, and that nothing has been said about the splendid physique of a great many men who are accepted. After visiting many of the training camps, both military and naval, comparatively recently, Mr. Camp was quite prepared to agree with those who praise the flower of our young manhood as being superior to that seen abroad. Dr. Sargent is quite right, however, that we ought not to have so many rejections and that it is time for us to realize that a man who is out of balance physically should be looked after. More than this, our men should not become out of balance. The truth of the matter is that our mechanical devices have gone so far toward taking the place of manual labor that we have left only one source of development, and that is in our athletic sports. If, therefore, these are not made broad enough and thorough enough and well enough considered we are likely to have just what is happening now, namely, a discrepancy when it comes to a measurement instituted by military authorities. Our young men flock to the cities, where they plunge into city life, with its attendant crowded conditions, lack of attractiveness for outdoor exercise, vitiated atmosphere, lack of sunshine, and lack of other things that go to the perfecting and keeping the physical man strong, robust, and enduring.

Proper exercise is the most potent element for counteracting these conditions. Air, bathing, and diet aid, but there must be exercise in order to get the energetic contraction of the larger muscles of the body, which go so far toward regulating their condition. There should be compensatory exercises, beginning as far down as our primary schools and going right through the secondary schools and universities.

Dr. William C. Woodward, chairman of the District police board in Washington, did not overstate the matter when he said that many officers of the several draft boards, when suddenly called upon to perform the grueling work of those boards, were soon overtaxed in physical strength, that the strain had begun to threaten their efficiency, and that they were thoroughly undermining their bodies in this effort. Almost every community saw the same thing happen, and many of these men would agree with Dr. Woodward that this came very close to threatening a serious calamity throughout the country. All these men should have been prepared by 30 or 60 days of physical training for this extra strain. The Equitable Life Assurance Society, in one of its bulletins, called attention to the fact that out of approximately 1,300,000 men who volunteered for the Army and Navy 448,859 were acceptable. The Equitable also calls attention to the fact that these physical impairments not only will not correct themselves but that they will get worse, and that a large percentage of our physically substandard men will early drift into sickness and premature death because their power to resist disease is rapidly declining. Upon this convincing evidence the Equitable then calls for a thorough and permanent system of health education in our schools, saying—

With all of our wealth and intelligence and scientific knowledge in the field of health conservation, we are allowing a large proportion of our children to pass out of the schools into adult life physically below par.

The Equitable concludes with the remark:

Some day we shall put all American school children through physical training and health education. Why not commence now?

If a man determined that because his horse or his dog showed exceptional intelligence he would endeavor to develop that intelligence at the expense of the physical by setting the animal at mental tasks, and so gave it only the exercise that would come from moving about the room, and no fresh air or sunshine, no road work or hunting, it is an easy guess what the result would be.

If a parent had a child that showed unusual mental precocity and therefore worked the child long hours, with no outdoor exercise, no fresh air, and no sunshine, such treatment would be rightfully regarded as criminal. Yet at least 50 per cent of our best men in this country, on account of loyalty, patriotism, or some other lofty emotion misdirected, are doing with themselves just what the owner of the horse or dog or the parent of the child would be doing in the illustrations cited. Some of these men, after struggling with a gradual deterioration in health, while still able to whip up their will into going on from day to day with the same program, finally conclude that unless they take a vacation they are going to break down. The doctor tells them so, and they finally realize it. Then they rush off for a week or 10 days, some of them into an orgy of exercise, others into a somnolent state of lying around and thanking their stars that they can rest at last. They feel better and do improve, even though one man runs himself into a state of physical exhaustion and the other loafs. Appetite returns, and probably both eat too much; but the change and the letting up in nervous tension have a good effect. What a man really needs is not to go pounding along forgetting all the laws of health until he comes close to the breaking point and then patching himself up with 10 days of completely changed life, only to return to the old grind once more, but to know how he can make that daily life not a grind and how he can keep fit all the time. This is the problem, and until a man solves it for himself he is going through the year with 10 days of comfort and of partial restoration to health and the other days in a condition of nervous tension and entirely without knowledge of what it feels like to be perfectly well.

To-day the gospel of exercise and of fresh air must be preached and practiced from the tiny tot playing in the newly found sand under the direction of the playground matron up to the old man who, although nearly fourscore, boasts of having had his full round of golf every Saturday at home and half the winter in the South. There is a story told of a philanthropist who became so interested and finally absorbed in Sunday-school work as to devote so many hours daily and nightly to this subject as to seriously undermine his health. Finally his physician, who was also a good churchman, was obliged to point out to his patient that he was not only jeopardizing his health, but also the very cause for which he was so assiduously working, by the irritability and ungraciousness which came from his own poor condition of health.

It is a perfectly fair statement that in this case not only the man benefited by this physician's sound advice, but the Sunday schools and the other philanthropic work in which he was engaged secured an equal profit, for a long outdoor vacation not only renewed his strength but his disposition and effectiveness. But he should never have reached this breaking point.

There is many a man to-day overworking himself in the mistaken notion that by steadily keeping his nose to the grindstone and amassing wealth he is benefiting his family.

No man has a right to put himself in such a condition that the family who love him are not always glad to hear his welcome footstep. No man has the right to count upon likening the affection of his boys and girls and his wife to that of a dog who, although cruelly treated by his master, will still fawn in good faith to him, forgetting everything even to seventy times seven. Moreover, when it is possible for that man, by exercising even a modicum of the brains which he is using to amass wealth to take care of himself and be a delight to his friends and household, there is little excuse for him. Still further, when the time comes and he breaks down, as perforce he must, for disobeying nature's laws, then dreary indeed, not only to himself but to his family, is that pursuit of lost health upon which he must enter. There will come many a day when he envies the day laborer and there will come many a night when, as he tosses in sleeplessness, he would fain pay any price to get back that health which he in his shortsightedness has sacrificed.

I remember seeing a picture once of a man marooned on the sands of a desert island, where he stood digging out great handfuls of golden dollars and piling them up by the side of the pit which he is digging. Meantime, sailing away from that island and leaving him to dig in starvation is the good ship Health with all her colors flying. It is a true picture, which many men to-day would do well to hang over their office desks so as to look at it occasionally, check up their conduct by it, and ask themselves what advantage is that pile of gold dollars if the ship has sailed.

Never has there been a greater demonstration of the value of physical fitness than in the remarkable college football season of 1919. One of the points that was peculiarly emphasized throughout the season was the close linking of the physical condition with that of the nerves. Upon no other basis can a satisfactory explanation be offered of the fact that a team might play a game of marvelous precision and success upon one Saturday and on the following Saturday seem to lack just that adjustment which had helped them to remarkable prowess on the previous week and might even go down in defeat to a team apparently not nearly their match. Football is, of course, a game for youth and for youth in the finest physical condition. But just as it is with youth and the results of a football season so it is with the average man in his combat with conditions after he has gone out into the larger world. The executive, the business man, the professional man, all are like these boys in that they are playing the game and playing it in earnest and need to have all the advantages that can possibly accrue to them from good physical condition and the steadily poised nerves which come with that condition. Many a professional man has had the experience of losing a case which he knows he might have won had his health and nerves been properly attuned. Many an executive realizes at times that he is stretching the bow and not only is his health liable to break but that the very things that he is doing are not done as well or as easily or as successfully as they were all accomplished when he was feeling fit. Hardly a reader of these lines but has had the experience of seeing small things look like mountains of difficulty, just because he was tired and played out, and after a vacation come back to find that most of them had taken care of themselves or had proved insignificant. Things that when in good condition he would have viewed as mere incidents magnify themselves into serious grievances when his viewpoint is colored by low physical or nervous tone.

Nature meant us to earn our bread by the sweat of the brow, and if a man does that nature generally gets him in good physical condition. But if he forgets all this, rides instead of walking, confines his energies to a swivel chair, stays within the four walls of a room, persists in the belief that he is the exception to every other animal that nature made, she soon begins to exact her penalties of him. He finds his resistive power lower. He finds he has more weight and less muscular strength to carry it. He dislikes exercise, because it tires him, and the less he exercises the more the deterioration goes on. Soon every organ partakes of this slackness. With his work comes worry and with that worry an irritable condition of the nerves. Suddenly he is brought up with a round stop and learns from his doctor that something is wrong with him. Then begins the pursuit of health, and vacations, which formerly were a pleasure to him, are full of the foreboding and wondering whether he will be all right in a month or six months. And all this can be prevented not by orgies of exercise, not by doing things to such an excess as to still further load the vitality and the resistive force, but by constant small doses daily of a moderate exercise, which takes nothing out of a man but exhilarates him and is after nature's own methods, which consist in gradual rather than violent changes. With the improvement that comes from this moderate exercise his will power strengthens and his appetite becomes more normal, so that he can more readily control it and eat in moderation and enjoy that food. And in proportion as he practices temperance, just so much does his mental and nervous tone improve. And he soon finds that there is double the enjoyment in the kind of eating he does when vigorous and under self-control than that which he practiced before. Every part helps a part, and when the circle is a vicious circle it leads around to greater deterioration, and when it is a beneficial circle it leads around to better and better improvement in all respects. The average man knows enough to take care of inanimate machines, to see that they have oil, to see that they are not run badly or in an imperfect condition. The average man will see that his horse or his motor car is properly taken care of. He will insist that his boys at school have proper exercise and sports. When it comes to himself he feels that he can take any liberty or license, forget all the dictates of health, and yet expect to go on with his work just the same.

As a man reaches the maximum of his physical strength he should begin to realize that half his life is passed and that the great desideratum thereafter is not to increase his muscular development, but to husband his vitality and resistive force. He has to begin, no matter how slightly, the journey wherein the capital he has stored up in a physical sense will be steadily but surely depleted. He must live upon that, and he can no longer expect to add to it or to live upon physical income alone. By this I do not mean that a man of 40 must always be asking himself, "Can I physically afford this exercise?" That would be nonsense and would defeat the very end and aim of these suggestions. He is to enjoy his sports and pleasures as before. Nature gives him a reasonable reserve. What he must not do, however, is to plunge into occasional orgies of exercise that make too serious inroads upon that stored-up energy which has now become his health capital. He can continue to be supple; he has no right to neglect the reasonable exercise of his muscles, to permit the stiffness and inefficiency of an unused muscular system to become prematurely old. But when he passes four-fifths of his time in hard and harassing mental effort, hemmed in by four walls, he can not spend the other fifth in such strenuous physical sport as shall make a still further drain upon his vitality. It is relaxation and restoration that he must seek, for after all man has but one store of vitality and upon that he draws mentally and physically. He must therefore have some simple, easy method, such as the "daily dozen" provides, to keep him in condition.

The country has been greatly interested in athletics and in sports. Lately the famous Carpentier, the heavy-weight boxing champion of the Old World, has come to these shores.

The greatest factor in Carpentier's work is his suppleness. This has been confirmed time and again, but the reports of his recent exhibition bout, coming from an Englishman, make this still more impressive. The puzzling fact about Carpentier is his ability to extricate himself from a difficult position, and to frequently turn that situation into one of immediate attack, much to the discomfiture of his opponent. This is the real test of that suppleness.

Mr. Camp tells this story:

Just the other day in a large vaudeville theater I saw a man demonstrating how to become and remain physically fit. He was one of the bulging muscle kind, and he did all the conventional things, exercising the muscles of the calf and hips, and the biceps, not once doing a single thing that the ordinary man needs to do. Yet he got a big round of applause, and no doubt many a deluded fellow went home and began raising and falling on his toes and bending forward, trying to touch the floor. One of the things the demonstrator said was this, "When you get so tired you can't do any more, do it again. And when you think that you will tumble on the floor with another effort, do it again. Again. Again." [Applause.]

At last we are really beginning to awaken, not only to the realities of the physical condition of our people, but what is far more practical, the examinations, tests, and methods by means of which we may be made better. Dr. Roger I. Lee, professor of hygiene at Harvard, recently announced the results of his examination of the freshman class at that university. He finds that some 80 per cent are deficient in bodily mechanics; that is, that they do not use their bodies well. He is quite ready to admit that this condition is so helped out by the youth of the subjects that they probably do not recognize this condition through any disagreeable features. In other words, their poor bodily mechanics is offset by their youth and otherwise good physical condition. But here is the point, such a condition continuing is pretty sure to grow worse, and as youth fades then serious troubles are likely to result. A description of the examination makes all this clear. He divides the men into four groups: A, those who have a good mechanical use of the body; B, fairly good; C, bad; and D, very bad. His percentages result as follows: A, 0.97; B, 14.8; C, 49.3; D, 34.8. 1916: A, 7.5; B, 12.5; C, 55; D, 25.

To make this more clear, it should be noted that those in group A carry the head straight above the chest, hips, and feet, with the chest up and forward, the abdomen flat, and natural curves in the back. Group B, head too far forward, chest not so well up, abdomen fairly flat, back nearly natural. Group C, head forward of chest, chest flat, abdomen relaxed and forward, back curves exaggerated. Group D, head still farther forward, chest flatter and farther back, abdomen completely relaxed, back curves exaggerated to the extreme.

The only way to attack this condition is to go back into the preparatory schools, and even to the earlier schools, and acquire a proper poise and carriage. Of course, it is possible to bring about some correction of these conditions after the man reaches college, but it is far simpler to prevent this condition prevailing by proper exercise earlier in life. The great difficulty has always been that we have made much more of what is a showy exhibition drill of children than the less flashy but far more effective, simple, muscle-stretching exercises devoted to the toning up of the larger muscles of the body, the correcting of the carriage of the head and shoulders, and the proper position of the chest and abdomen, with breathing exercises not too forced, but to secure the results of proper breathing rather than exaggerated, pouter-pigeon chests. The average child, through the medium of play which is enjoyable, will get all the necessary exercise for the arms and legs, and will get that exercise in a pleasurable way if provided with time and facilities, but the average child will not acquire a correct carriage without some advantageous aids. It would seem, perhaps, that nature would take care of this matter of carriage; so she would were it not for the inroad of civilization. Book learning and indoor pursuits have come in and have weakened us in this respect. If the child never stooped over a book, lived an ordinary savage life out of doors all the time, the majority would, of course, be hardier, more robust, and would have a better natural carriage; but we can not bring up children now for a savage life, because what they must do in later years to earn their living requires a preparation quite different from that if their later years were to be spent in hunting and fishing.

One of the great points to be observed in adapting the proper exercises to children and youth is to avoid the mistake of making them do things for considerable periods of time that are distasteful and a distinct bore and hence are shirked in every possible way. The system must be devised along lines that provide for only a few minutes at a time, but all of those few minutes devoted to the very most essential motions. In this way one may eliminate nine-tenths of all arm and leg exercise formerly given in calisthenics, having full confidence that these arms and legs will be exercised far more satisfactorily in play and games, and thus instead of going through hundreds of meaningless motions, which may look attractive in exhibition drill on a gymnasium floor, we can take only those exercises which have a direct bearing on this matter of poise, balance, and future good health.

If any there be who do not know who Walter Camp is, for their sake I insert a few extracts from an article written by William Slavens McNutt, who went to New Haven for a personal interview with the noted athlete and business man on the subject of keeping fit. I quote:

If you're looking for examples of men snatched from death's door and metamorphosed over week ends into pugilistic champions, super-Sandows, or Marathon contenders, look elsewhere. You won't find them in this story. If you are looking for a sane, simple, natural way by which to attain and maintain a normal physical and nervous fitness at the daily expenditure of time and effort that the busiest of men can spare—read on.

Walter Camp, athlete, recognized authority on athletics and athletic training, graduate of Yale and long prominently identified with all forms of amateur sport for as many years back as I can remember, and besides successful author and business man, has evolved a sane, universally available system whereby you may keep yourself normally fit, whether you be child or adult, scholar or ditch digger, business man or mechanic. It is so simple that minus a trial or the verdict of evidence, you might consider it silly. It does not work wonders. It works plain normalities.

The man who offers you a system of exercise and diet that will work a 100 per cent miracle is very probably a health quack. He's either a dishonest, dollar-hunting faker or a dangerously sincere fanatic, because systems of exercise and diet do not work miracles. The sensible man in search of a safe financial investment looks for something that will pay 6, 8, or 10 per cent with a minimum risk of loss. And the sensible man or woman in search of health and strength looks for a normal, available system of exercise, returning a dividend of well-being that Mother Nature can indorse without being drugged, hypnotized, or bullied into an O. K.

I suppose that ninety-nine out of every hundred people who read this know in a general way who and what Walter Camp is. But his varied work in life has so eminently fitted him ultimately to do the thing he has done, in evolving this simple, efficient system of exercises, that it is well worth noting in somewhat elaborate detail.

As a college athlete he played on the varsity football team; was captain in his junior and senior years. He rowed on his class crew. He was a track star. In his sophomore year he was one of Yale's representatives in the first intercollegiate tennis championship event. He was shortstop on the baseball team and led in both batting and fielding. For many years he has been chairman of the Yale University Athletic Association, and in 1917 he was appointed chairman of the athletic department of the United States Navy Commission on Training Camp Activities and to the position of civilian consultant to the Surgeon General concerning the proper method of assuring physical fitness amongst aviators. It was while engaged in this work that he evolved what he calls his "shorthand system" of setting-up exercises, or "the daily dozen."

A few years ago it was necessary for a man to be a candidate for some one of the Yale teams in order to avail himself of the benefit of Mr. Camp's wisdom. To-day one need be able only to read to avail himself of that same wisdom. What Walter Camp once did to Yale athletes, what he did for Uncle Sam's men in the Navy training stations and on the aviation field, what he did for Government officials during the war, he now wants to do for the entire Nation. The stored wisdom that was once the property of Yale athletes is offered to the country at large.

Mr. Camp talked about mother nature very intimately. He's a close friend of hers, and he understands her. Also, he's the friend of men, and he understands them; and he knows that the secret of amicable relationship between them was merely a matter of understanding and adjustment to conditions. A tiger, born in captivity, and reared in a small cage, successfully attains his growth and full strength, maintaining his physical power and condition for a normal period. He gets exercise enough to keep himself normally fit. Mr. Camp contends that a man confined in an office can do the same for himself and in much the same way. Did you ever see a tiger sitting stiffly up on his hind legs, monotonously flexing his fore legs to increase the size of his muscles? Not since the 1st of July, you haven't! But if you'll go to a zoo any time and stand before a tiger's cage for a few minutes, you'll see the big cat stretching the muscles of his body in different ways, and by so doing massaging the vital organs inside his frame.

"Your legs and arms are plenty good enough for whatever you're doing," said Mr. Camp. "If you're sitting at a desk all day, you don't want enormously muscled legs and arms; and if you acquire them they are a detriment and a danger to you. On the other hand, if you're a blacksmith, wielding a hammer, nature will provide you with a big arm for the performance of your work, but you needn't worry about the arms and legs, nature will tend to making them sufficient for the task they are called upon to perform. It is the engine under the hood that counts; the heart and lungs and liver, all the organs of the body. What we have to do with the ordinary business man, professional man, or working man is to keep that engine running smoothly."

"Mother nature is very fair, even indulgent, with a man," Mr. Camp said to me. "You can do a great deal against her orders and still she will protect you in your folly. When a boy first starts to smoke she warns him that it is an unwise thing by making him sick. When he persists, mother nature says, 'Oh, very well; it's mild infraction of my rules, and I'll protect him in his lawlessness to a certain extent!'" The boy grows into a man and gets to smoking so heavily that he's lighting one cigar from another during all his waking hours. Mother nature says, "Here, I can't stand for this! If this fellow doesn't improve his ways I'll have to dispose of him." But she is still indulgent about the matter. She gives him a little heart flutter as a warning to ease up. The fellow goes to a doctor, and the doctor tells him to cut down on his smoking. Then, if he's stubborn and doesn't obey orders finally mother nature says, 'Here! This fellow's a fool. He can't take a hint, even when it falls on him in the form of a brick house. He cumbers the earth to no purpose. I'll get rid of him.' And she does. But she always gives him plenty of warning first."

I close these remarks, which are for the most part by or concerning Mr. Camp or his work, by quoting his citizen's creed and his comment upon it:

"I believe that a nation must be made up of people who individually possess clean, strong bodies and pure minds, who have respect for their own rights and those of others and possess the courage and strength to redress wrongs, and finally in whom self-consciousness is sufficiently powerful to preserve these qualities. I believe in education, patriotism, justice, and loyalty. I believe in civil and religious liberty and freedom of thought and speech. I believe in that chivalry that protects the weak and preserves veneration and love for parents, and in that physical strength that makes that chivalry effective. I believe in that clear thinking and straight speaking which conquers envy, slander, and fear. I believe in the trilogy of faith, hope, and charity, in the dignity of labor, and that through these and education true democracy may come to the world.

"If a man really believes these things then he must follow out the precepts for physical fitness himself and see that they are followed out in his home and community, for we have lately learned at severe cost that all the talk about rights is valueless unless backed up by the physical force to protect those rights."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAVEY].

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee I wish to take just a few minutes in which to discuss a matter which seems to me of vital importance to the whole Nation, and I hope that it may receive the consideration which is due. This is the impending collapse in the Postal Service.

That may sound a little extreme, and yet, gentlemen, in all of the large industrial cities particularly the Postal Service is rapidly going to pieces.

I wish that it might be possible for this Congress to act. June 30 is the end of the fiscal year, and it is my calm judgment that unless we do something to relieve the situation there will be a large number of old, trained men in the Postal Service leave for better-paying positions.

I have viewed this proposition from a business standpoint. This Congress is the board of directors of the American Nation. We owe it to our people to meet and solve this particular question, because the welfare of the United States surrounds this Postal Service and is vitally affected by it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVEY. Gladly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I realize the truth of what you say, and thoroughly agree with you, and will ask you if you do not agree with me that the time has come when the Postal Commission ought to hasten their work and send as rapidly as possible to Congress a report of their proceedings and their conclusions, so that we may get some adequate legislation that will promote the efficiency of the service and prevent the evils from which we are now suffering?

Mr. DAVEY. I agree absolutely. It seems to me that this commission ought to function and that Congress ought to act. It is my honest judgment, gentlemen, and I will state it for what it may be worth, that unless we meet this question now there will be a near collapse, if not a total collapse, in the Postal Service shortly after July 1.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVEY. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. At best this collapse can not continue much beyond March 4 next, can it, I will ask the gentleman? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVEY. That is a very fanciful and far-fetched notion [applause on the Democratic side]; assuming that this Republican Congress fails on the job, then after the damage is done you are going to correct it after March 4. This is highly transparent political philosophy.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVEY. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman whether one of the difficulties is not the fact that the Postmaster General has been endeavoring to run the postal business of the country with but few employees, and whether or not he has not cut down, under orders from Washington, the number of carriers and the number of employees in the post offices?

Mr. DAVEY. I am perfectly willing that that question should be raised and perfectly willing to answer it on the basis of the conditions I find at Akron, Ohio, where they have hired men by the hundreds and can not keep them because of the inadequate salaries.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is just the situation.

Mr. DAVEY. We have dozens of vacancies among the regular employees. Many men come in for a little while and then go out because the salaries will not support their families even reasonably.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I could give the gentleman a little information along that line, if he desires.

Mr. DAVEY. In a moment. We passed a bill last summer making the temporary rate 60 cents an hour, which was fine as far as it went. I was told a short time ago of a temporary clerk who had been working at this starting rate of 60 cents per hour, and finally he was posted as a regular employee. On coming into the post office a friend advised him that he had been placed on the regular roll as a permanent clerk, and he went immediately to get his hat, turned on his heel, and walked right out.

Now, what was the reason? The starting salary is $1,200 a year—$100 a month—and, if you figure it out on the basis of 26 working days, 8 hours a day, it makes 48 cents an hour at the beginning for a permanent clerk or carrier, while the temporaries receive 60 cents an hour. Just so soon as a temporary man is appointed a permanent clerk he drops from 60 cents to 48 cents.

Mr. KNUTSON. Probably they do not want to be a permanent part of this administration. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVEY. The gentleman is highly optimistic, I see. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVEY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I was about to suggest, in response to the suggestion that was thrown out to you a moment ago, that when the bill was up which would have given the House a chance to vote for fair and adequate pay to the letter carriers and the postal clerks and other postal employees it was gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber—on the Republican side—who objected to every single amendment in this House, and the House had to operate under a suspension of the rules, and no amendment was in order.

I then asked, as a member of the committee, the opportunity to offer one amendment, namely, to increase the salaries of postal employees 35, or even 25, per cent; and yet objection was made, and we were cut off from the opportunity of getting a vote to help these poor fellows get adequate pay.

Mr. DAVEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] in response to the little jest that he just threw into the RECORD, about being indentified with the administration—that is pure piffle, gentlemen. The postal employees are supposed to be permanent employees of the Government of the United States, irrespective of party. The average postal employee takes his job seriously. He likes his work. He wants to remain permanently in that service, except when it becomes impossible, when his condition is made oppressive, as it is to-day, when he finds it impossible to keep up with the cost of living on the grossly inadequate salary; and then of course he does the only natural thing—he goes out where he can get a decent wage.

If we lay down on this job and allow the Postal Service to go to pieces, we alone are responsible.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Will he yield?

Mr. DAVEY. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have quite a number of postal employees in my district, and I have been postmaster myself twice, and I know something about it. I know that in my own city the number of employees in the post office was cut down by orders from Washington. Now why? Because they asked the postmaster if he could not get along with a little less expense, and he took it as a warrant to him to cut down the number of his employees.

So he suggested that he could get along with so many less carriers than he had, and the consequence was that these men were dropped from the rolls, notwithstanding some of them had been on the rolls for 8 or 10 years. When I heard of it I went to the postmasters in several other places in my district and I said to them, "Here, if you get an order to cut your people down, don't you do it without consulting me," and they have not cut down anywhere else. I did not know anything about this when it was done in my own city. It was done quietly by a man who had no business to do it.

Mr. DAVEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not yield to him for a speech.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; but I want to tell you a little truth. It is done by the present administration, and we can not help it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DAVEY. All right.

Mr. BLANTON. Answering this Republican barrage and camouflage, is it not a fact that the post-office employees receive in salaries not what the Postmaster General gives them, but just exactly what this Republican steering committee wills?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is camouflage of the worst kind.

Mr. COOPER. I have just been informed by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that they appropriated $69,814,000 more for postal employees' salaries than the Postmaster General recommended.

Mr. DAVEY. However that may be, the fact remains that you can not keep postal employees on their present salaries, for which Congress alone is responsible.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will yield for an observation, I hate to take his time, but in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] and in justice to the Postmaster General, I want to say that his estimates were based on current law. He has no authority to base an estimate on anything except existing law, and the appropriation of the $70,000,000 additional was by reason of the emergency act of November, 1919.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman from Texas yield there?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. DAVEY. Well, gentlemen, will you kindly yield to me? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. With the gentleman's permission——

Mr. DAVEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to get into the RECORD two or three more thoughts. [Laughter.] The fact is, gentlemen, that it is a very serious situation. You can not keep regular postal employees, in the large industrial centers particularly—and I am told that practically the same thing applies all over the country—on the salaries which they receive. Think of it! They start in at $100 a month. They must buy their own uniforms, and the maximum they can get is $1,650 a year, even including the bonus. Now, any kind of a man can go across the street and make a great deal more money. You need and must have in the Postal Service intelligent men who are capable and dependable. You have had for years a fine type of men in the Postal Service, but gradually they are losing heart and going out, and we can not blame them.

I speak with particular reference to the industrial cities like Akron, where the situation is highly acute. Perhaps it is as bad in Akron as in any place in the whole country, although I am advised that in practically all the cities the situation is about the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, these old and trained men are going out one by one, because they have lost heart. Temporary clerks are employed, and the turnover in the temporary clerks is astounding. Any business concern that experienced such a turnover would be facing a receivership, and this Congress ought to take note of that condition. You can not run the Post Office Department on that basis.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. DAVEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I notice that it was stated in the bulletin issued by the Council of National Defense two or three weeks ago that the rubber-tire industry at Akron and other Ohio cities was so wonderfully prosperous that they were paying $6 a day to their common laborers. Now, if that is correct, does the gentleman think that Congress can fix a permanent scale of salaries so as to compete with these unusual conditions?

Mr. DAVEY. Possibly not. The gentleman is correct. Salaries in Akron are pleasingly high. I do not mean to invite the Members of the House to go to Akron for work, but as a matter of fact the situation there is acute, one of the worst in the country; and yet, while you can not hope, perhaps, to compete with these acute situations, you can at least strike a happy average that will meet the situation reasonably. Later on I may have some suggestions to offer along that line.

Here, then, you have a situation where a moderate remnant of the old employees remain as the backbone of your Postal Service. In addition to them you have a large number of temporary employees. Among those temporaries there is a constant and alarming turnover, and they tell me that it takes at least two temporaries to do the work of one regular. It is the greatest kind of waste, a most inexcusable waste. It seems to me that by a proper, businesslike attitude on this thing we can correct the trouble for the most part without adding unreasonably to the cost by giving the permanent men fairly adequate salaries and making it possible for them to live. A friend of mine told me a little while ago of a postal carrier who came into his office practically in rags. This friend asked him how much he was getting, and he told him he was getting the maximum, $1,650. He had a large family, and he said that it was impossible for him to maintain his family and meet expenses on that salary, and he was becoming hopeless. My friend said he was ashamed of his Government, and rightly so, because these indispensable Government servants, of whom we expect so much and on whom so much depends, are inadequately compensated.

Just one thing more: You can talk all you please about the Postmaster General. You can duck responsibility just as much as you wish, but the American people know that this Congress has entire power to handle this question if it will. We must answer for the present serious condition. If a collapse comes, as it must come if this Congress fails to do its obvious duty, then this Congress, and no one else, must explain, if it can, its negligence and incapacity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY].

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I notice this bill carries an appropriation of $2,000,000 for the detection and prosecution of crime and $100,000 for the prosecution of offenses under the Sherman antitrust law. This last item is in addition to the $200,000 already appropriated, making in all $300,000 for the enforcement of the antitrust law. In the light of the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case against the United States Steel Corporation, I do not see why we should spend this additional sum. This law was passed to prevent the larceny by a combination of two or more persons. According to Justice Day:

> This record seems to me to leave no fair room for a doubt that the defendants, the United States Steel Corporation and the several subsidiary corporations which make up that organization, were formed in violation of the Sherman Act. * * * It appears to be thoroughly established that the formation of the corporations, here under consideration, constituted combinations between competitors, in violation of law, and intended to remove competition and to directly restrain trade. * * * That the combinations were not submissions to business conditions but were designed to control them for illegal purposes regardless of other consequences, and "were made upon a scale that was huge and in a manner that was wild." * * * The Steel Corporation was a combination of combinations by which directly or indirectly 180 independent concerns were brought under one control. * * * The control acquired over the branches of the industry to which the combinations particularly related, measured by the amount of production, extended in some instances from 80 per cent to 95 per cent of the entire output of the country, resulting in the immediate increase in prices, in some cases double and in others treble what they were before, yielding large dividends upon greatly inflated capital. * * * The enormous overcapitalization of companies and the appropriatiton of $100,000,000 in stock to promotion expenses were represented in the stock issues of the new organizations thus formed, and were the basis upon which large dividends have been declared from the profits of the business. * * * This unlawful organization exerted its power to control and maintain prices by pools, associations, trade meetings, and as the result of discussion and agreements at the so-called "Gary dinners." * * * The corporation violated the law in its formation and by its immediate practices. * * * If the Sherman Act is to be given efficacy, there must be a decree undoing so far as is possible that which has been achieved in open, notorious, and continued violation of its provisions.

Mr. Chairman, that is not my language, but that of Justice Day, one of the members of the Supreme Court. If that is true, what is the use of throwing all this money away? The courts will not enforce the law against the unlawful practices of corporate wealth. In 1911 this same court held in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases that it is perfectly proper for a large concern to violate this law, provided they are reasonable in what they take, and to-day when a person wants gasoline or oil all he needs to do is to back up to any tank and pay the price asked by the trust, for competition has long ago ceased.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us not be too hard on this court by only quoting from Justice Day. Let us see what Justice McKenna has to offer as an excuse for permitting this concern to steal $100,000,000 and go scot free. Here is what he says for and in behalf of the majority of the court:

> Its power was efficient only when in cooperation with its competitors, and hence it concerted with them in the expedients of pools, associations, trade meetings, and finally in a system of dinners. * * * It did not have power in and of itself, and the control it exerted was only in and by association with its competitors. * * * The only attempt at a fixation of prices was, as already said, through an appeal to and confederation with competitors. * * * The corporation was formed in 1901; no act of aggression upon its competitors is charged against it; it confederated with them at times in offense against the law, but abandoned that before this suit was brought, and since 1911 no act in violation of law can be established against it, except its existence be such an act.

I shall not quote any more. I leave this case with you, gentlemen, and let you decide from these two opinions if the appropriation is not a waste of the people's money.

HOW THE STEEL TRUST MADE THEIR MILLIONS.

The majority opinion in substance held, as you will note, that this trust should be forgiven because it did not violate the law after the suit was brought by the Government in 1911. In other words, they laid down the principle that even though a man commits a murder he can not be punished if he does not commit another before trial. The reason I probably feel so deeply is that while prosecuting attorney I encountered this gigantic trust and its subsidiary companies, at which time they were working under a crude gentleman's agreement, dividing the territory in the middle Northwest among themselves in the matter of contracts for bridges, the lowest bidder dividing fifty-fifty with all those present at the letting. In other words, the corporation constructing the bridge was to get half and the balance to be divided among those who bid higher. Of course, the companies and the agents were all indicted, but for years they continued the fight, and finally they asked the attorney general of my State to oust them in order to escape prosecution. They then filed pleas in abatement, and concluded their brief with the following words:

The State giveth life; the State taketh away; blessed be the name of the State.

This was answered by indictment of all the officers of the companies having received this illegal money, after which I was charged with lese majesty because one of the defendants happened to be a nephew of a former President and one a father-in-law of the then President of the United States. The fight continued over a period of years, resulting in their conviction, but not until a Federal judge threatened to imprison the officers of my county because they dared to ask for books under the direction of a trustee in bankruptcy. During this fight my office was burglarized half a dozen times and my desk cut open for the purpose of stealing the testimony I had, which consisted in part of bank drafts showing the payment of the pool and the persons receiving the same. And when I think of the disagreements of the juries it reminds me of the first trial in one of these cases, where two of the jurors hung out for days; but there was one farmer who refused to agree to a verdict of disagreement and assured them that even though the wheat in the fields was golden and ready for the harvest, he would permit the same to rot before he would ever agree to a disagreement. The same combination sold culvert pipe to my county for $76 per ton when it could be purchased for $19 per ton. That the court should excuse this grand larceny because the trust has grown fat violates the very preamble of our Constitution guaranteeing "domestic tranquillity." And then we are told not to prosecute these trusts stealing millions, because it might disurb business.

COURTS ALONE CAN SEND CRIMINALS TO PRISON.

We hear a great many Congressmen and Senators, as well as other folks, blame the Attorney General for not sending these profiteers to prison, but they forget that all he can do is to prosecute the case and procure conviction. It is up to the court to sentence the defendants after conviction. Mr. Chairman, because of this erroneous opinion I thought it might be interesting for the Members of this House to know the history of the prosecutions under the Sherman antitrust law since its passage, July 2, 1890. I find that 217 cases were brought under this act, while only 58 were prosecuted by indictment and 159 prosecuted by injunction under section 4 to "prevent and restrain violations of the act." But what became of the 58 indictments? The record shows that in 36 cases the defendants plead guilty, in 13 cases they were found guilty by a jury, while in 6 cases the verdict was "not guilty" and in 2 cases the jury disagreed—a fine record for the number of criminal cases filed. But what did the court do? We find that in each and every case they fined the defendant (except in 4 cases, 2 cases where some labor unions were convicted and 2 cases growing out of the World War, which last 2 cases do not properly belong under this line of cases, because at that time we had no war legislation). In the balance of the cases, 159 in number, petitions were filed where the Government attempted to restrain further unlawful acts. A prison cell for these offenders is the only remedy.

However, the Department of Justice can not send a single offender to jail. It is up to the courts. A little thought will convince anyone that the sheriff and prosecutor can imprison anyone only under an order of the court. But the courts have not yet issued the order, for they are too far removed from the people to hear their cry, and there is no way to remove them when they become deaf to righteousness.

ENORMOUS FORTUNES AND HOW MADE.

Senator CAPPER, of Kansas, in his speech of April 24, apparently attempted to call the attention of the country to the Attorney General's failure to prosecute the profiteers, and produced figures showing percentages of profits of the following financial concerns:

Continental Oil, 200 per cent; United Fuel Gas, 200 per cent; Ohio Fuel Supply, 100 per cent; Nonquit Spinning Co., 100 per cent; Amoskeag Cotton Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; Stutz Motors, 100 per cent; Nashua Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; American Tobacco Security Co., 75 per cent; Manomet Mills, 55⅝ per cent; Hood Rubber Co., 66⅔ per cent; Crucible Steel, 50 per cent; Cleveland-Akron Bag, 50 per cent; Union Bag and Paper, 50 per cent; Auto-Car Co., 40 per cent; John R. Thompson Co., 33⅓ per cent; St. Maurice Paper Co., 30 per cent; F. W. Woolworth, 30 per cent; Electric Welding, of Boston, 25 per cent; Delaware & Cleveland, 25 per cent; Hawaiian Pineapple Co., 25 per cent; Electric Welding Co., 25 per cent; General Chemical Co., 20 per cent; American Multigraph, 20 per cent; Truscan Steel, 20 per cent.

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has recently increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $30,000,000, giving its stockholders a stock dividend of 2,900 per cent.

He might have added the profits of the American Woolen Trust. The records show that from 1914 to 1918 the operating income, after deducting expenses, had increased from $2,788,000 to $12,324,000, or 342 per cent over 1914. But that is not all; the company deducted, not only wage increases and higher production cost, but also the Federal income and excess-profits tax, thus shifting the burden to the shoulders of the public. Besides, in 1918, over $5,000,000 were charged against depreciation, and in 1919 the common stockholders received Liberty bonds equivalent to 15 per cent on their holdings. Between 1914 and 1918 the records show that the company has increased its capital stock from $21,800,000 to $53,800,000, and increased its accumulated surplus earnings from $8,000,000 to $19,000,000.

The Senator might also have included the United Drug Co. In 1917 the common dividend balance jumped to $10.40 per share and in 1918 to $17.50, while the surplus earnings were 242 per cent larger than at the close of 1916. I think from a careful checking the Senator might revise his figures of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co. This company also shifted the burden of the high taxes on the consumer. In 1917 they produced over 200,000,000 yards of cotton and 1,200,000 cotton bags, and although the sales of this company in 1919 were 35½ per cent less than in 1917, the receipts from sales were 44 per cent higher in 1919 than in 1917. The net profits of the company jumped from $860,000 in 1917 to $6,891,000 in 1919, or 681 per cent.

PAPER TRUST AND HOW IT EVADES THE LAW.

But the Senator might also have included the profits of the paper manufacturers. The records in the Federal courts show that five defendants belonging to the Paper Trust plead guilty in November, 1917, and were fined $11,000. The International Paper Co., one of the members of the trust, according to the annual report, showed a net profit in 1915 of $12,402,050, while in 1918, the year after conviction of the trust, their profits were $19,442,872. And this is only 1 of 46 members of the Paper Trust, where a fine of $11,000 was assessed. Is it any wonder that they are ignoring the court? A little fine will only tend to destroy the monotony of stealing.

The Attorney General seemingly was not satisfied with this sentence of the court under the plea of guilt, and on November 26, 1917, he filed his petition and procured a restraining order and dissolution of the trust. Each defendant entered into an agreement with the Attorney General of the United States, as trustee, beginning April 1, 1918, and continuing during the period of the war and three months thereafter, in which the manufacturers of paper agreed that they "will abide by the terms and prices of sale to be fixed by the Federal Trade Commission, subject to review by the circuit judges for the second circuit as arbitrators, and that in the meantime, while the commission is making the necessary investigations, they will charge not in excess of $3 per hundred pounds in carload lots and $3.25 per hundred pounds in less than carload lots." What is the result under the direction of these Federal judges acting as arbitrators? I find that since that time two of the leading dailies in my district had to suspend business. The former editor of one of these papers wrote me as follows:

Sentiment does not pay for a car of paper, which formerly cost $1,200 a car and now costs $7,500.

You, gentlemen, will find that you are paying now not 3 cents per pound but 11½ to 12½ cents for the white paper to send out your speeches, and if you want them printed on newsprint you will be paying 14½ cents per pound, making the cost for an eight-page pamphlet $8.23 for the first thousand and $4.07 for each additional thousand. The charge for your stationery has been advanced to 18 cents a pound. Thus these interests have advanced the cost of everything, making it impossible for a Member of Congress to save any money out of his salary and take care of his district.

NOT POLITICAL BUT AN ECONOMIC QUESTION.

I ask you, gentlemen, who is to blame? These are economic and not political questions. We might just as well face the facts. Under our Constitution there are still three branches to carry on our Government, and the executive as well as the legislative branches are helpless if the judiciary fails in its duty. Send them to jail, you say. Are the courts hearing your request? I hesitate to criticize a court, because I have always considered that our judiciary should continue our "shield and palladium of our liberties," as was intended by the framers of our Constitution, but if you believe with me that imprisonment is the only effective remedy, do not show your ignorance by abusing the Department of Justice, but let us call on the only branch of the Government having the power to send these men to a prison's cell.

SUGAR TRUST.

Just now there seems to be a great deal of criticism directed toward the Attorney General and the administration because of the high cost of sugar. Mr. Chairman, it will be very interesting to know that when the Department of Justice completed the taking of evidence in the Sugar Trust and were ready for trial the court ordered that the hearing of this case be postponed to await the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Harvester and Steel cases. I have already given you the result of the Steel decision. The district court, no doubt, will be guided by this decision, so that it is a foregone conclusion that the courts will tell the Sugar Trust, "Well done, good and faithful servant * * *; for whosoever hath to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not from him shall be taken away even that he hath," and then the price of sugar will go soaring, and cheap politicians, who think they can fool the public, will blame the Department of Justice. However, the department has a war measure which they could enforce, provided the Sugar Trust will not be able to procure an injunction from the courts on the ground that the war is over. Just now in Ohio we are compelled to pay the New York price for sugar plus the freight from there, even though the shipment is made only a few miles from home.

AMERICAN PUBLIC IS REDUCED TO A COMMERCIAL VASSAL.

Is it possible that the patient, suffering public is going to be patient always? No matter where we turn, the consumer is paying tribute to some trust. The American public has been paying tribute as a commercial vassal for 25 years. Just recently the Rubber Tire Trust increased the prices of tires from 15 to 20 per cent, and I understand that in a few weeks we are to have another increase of 10 per cent. Not by one but all, mind you. Unrest stalks in the land. This country is on the toboggan, and it seems that we will not quit sliding until we reach the foot of the hill of selfishness. You can not bring about "domestic tranquillity" until you remove the cause of this unrest.

CONGRESS SHOULD GRANT SOME RELIEF, IF POSSIBLE.

The people are looking to Congress to deal with the situation, but the people seemingly will not turn from their selfish ways of chasing the dollar until they are impoverished. For only when hunger stalks in the land will they seek righteousness. Congress can not legislate men to become either moral or honest. All we can do is to put on the brakes and thus hope to avoid the disaster which has befallen the Russian people.

I say we are coming to the crucial period in this country. Various remedies have been offered. There are those who go to the extreme and will tell us that because of these decisions of the Federal judges of our land, they should be elected by the people. Our circuit court of appeals comprises more than one State in its jurisdiction. I believe in mine it comprises Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, and Michigan. Thus it will be utterly impossible to have election machinery whereby Federal judges could be elected by the people.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. What does the gentleman think about the proposition to have them appointed for a certain number of years and to be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. WELTY. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I do not believe that 5 per cent of our attorneys in this land know the qualifications of the judges of our circuit court of appeals or of the Supreme Court of the United States. If 5 per cent of the legal fraternity are unable to cast an intelligent vote to elect the judiciary, how, then, could you expect the people who do not come in contact with courts to elect these judges? There are those who even go further and advocate the recall of judicial opinions. In other words, the opinion that was rendered in the Steel case should be submitted to 110,000,000 people for review.

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES FOR TERM OF YEARS.

Now, coming to the point and answering the question of the gentleman from Oklahoma, I would say that during the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses I offered bills requiring the appointment of judges for a term of years instead of life. I realize that there are those who think—and rightfully—that the framers of the Constitution were big men and knew what they were doing, and thus are slow to make a change.

But, my friends, they framed the Constitution in the light they had, and that light was history. They could only judge the future by the past. Judges at first were appointed by the King. They held office during the will and pleasure of the King. Our Constitution provides that they should be appointed "during good behavior."

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS EPOCHS IN HISTORY.

If you examine the decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of our land you will find that they are landmarks in our history. Examine the first decision in the matter of a constitutional amendment, and you will find the case of McCullough against Maryland, in which the court held that the national-bank act of 1816 was constitutional. This decision was reversed by the people under the leadership of Andrew Jackson in 1830. Then the next decision that we had that affected the whole country was the Dred Scott decision, rendered in 1856, which brought on the Civil War and the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. The income-tax decision of 1895 brought on the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution. Let us review the decisions further under the Sherman antitrust law, and you will find that these cases, 217 in number, fall naturally into two classes.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. In a moment. The final culmination under this antitrust act was the case against the Standard Oil Co. and Tobacco Trust in 1911, where the court for the first time attempted to usurp the power of Congress by legislating, wherein they held that a reasonable restraint was altogether proper and right. The next decision was in a case which was started about the same time against the Danbury hatters of Connecticut, where laboring men contended for a higher wage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me five minutes more?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WELTY. These laborers were found guilty and fined $275,000. Their homes were taken away from them. That case was decided by the Supreme Court in 1908 and 1915. Then for the first time this Congress attempted to come to the rescue of the people by enacting special legislation. After that decision Congress passed the Clayton antitrust law, declaring that the Sherman Act did not apply to labor and farm organizations. That was done for the purpose of counteracting the decision in said cases. Next there came along this case against the United States Steel Corporation, where the court excused the theft of $100,000,000 by a great corporation that controlled, according to the decision of Justice Day, from 80 to 95 per cent of the business, while, on the other hand, farm organizations are being prosecuted and are coming to Congress asking for special legislation. I say that the decisions of this court have been landmarks in the history of this country. What the decisions in the Standard Oil, Tobacco, and Steel cases will bring about God only knows—evolution or revolution. Oh, you talk about Bolshevists and talk about the discontented folks at home; you talk about the unrest to-day, and you run around and try to find some remedy, when, in fact, the only remedy asked is equal and exact justice to all. But the people know that they have not been receiving it from the judicial branch of our Government. I know that I am asking a great deal when I ask that this Congress amend the Constitution, providing for the appointment of these judges for a term of years instead of for life. The Sixty-fifth Congress passed a bill which permitted the members of the Supreme Court to retire with full pay at the age of 70, but not one of them has resigned. All but one of those who rendered the majority opinion in the Steel case are over 70.

MAD RUSH FOR THE DOLLAR WILL IMPOVERISH THE NATION.

During the war the farmers and workmen responded to the demand for production, but after the smoke of battle cleared away they found that there were those who were not so patriotic. The charge has been made repeatedly in this and the Senate Chamber that the war produced 23,000 new millionaires. Now, in these reconstruction days we hear voices again advising more work and production, but the producing class seemingly has lain down on their jobs, for they have no heart to hand the finished product over to the manipulator, who never added anything to what is produced. Because of this condition labor is at least one-third less efficient now than before the war, and the farmer is now asking special laws exempting him from the operation of the antitrust laws, so he can find a way to produce two hogs and receive the price of three, even though it is necessary for him to raise three hogs if no one should go hungry. I say the producing class will not produce the maximum until justice is administered for all classes. But if this is to continue until we reach the foot of the hill of selfishness, we can thank God that next year will find us nearer the end, even though there will be more hunger in the land, because the farmer can not produce enough to feed all.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, some action must be taken if we want to avoid reaping the whirlwind. Either we must strengthen the antitrust laws and give more power to the Federal Trade Commission, or the judiciary must be made responsive. When the Republicans succeeded I was glad that their campaign slogan was reform and reconstruction to bring about better conditions. But nothing has been done, and I doubt if much hope can be expected so long as every member of the steering committee of the House belongs to the millionaire's class.

LINCOLN HAD A VISION.

Lincoln saw the dawn of this day when he said:

As a result of this war corporations have been enthroned and an era of corruption in high places will follow—and warned the people of this Republic that the final concentration of wealth would eventually mean its destruction. But it seems almost a tragedy when one beholds the great party of Lincoln, under whose leadership the negro was freed, that now the white man, as well as the negro, is being enslaved by the concentration of wealth, which that great man warned us against during his last days.

HOPE RESTS WITH THE SPIRIT OF THE WAR VETERANS.

In 1917 the whole world was at bay because an autocrat ruler conceived the idea that he was the chosen one of God and that might makes right. The American people were patient but when this autocracy threatened our national life they mobilized all its wealth and man power. They said we could not raise an army because we were consumed in our wealth, but we raised over 4,000,000 men in the shortest period of time known in history. They said we could not transport more than 500,000, and at no time could we place an effective Army in Europe. They knew we had no ships, but, Mr. Chairman, we began to build ships and in a little over a year and a half we placed over 2,000,000 fighting men in France and had an equal number here ready to cross if necessary. It was the American boy who saved the day on land and sea and destroyed the autocracy which was a constant menace to our democratic institutions. These boys have saved the day from Chateau-Thierry to the Argonne Forest. Is it said that the remnant who fought a foreign autocrat will permit a domestic autocrat to destroy the present civilization and forge chains to bind our children into bondage? Is the spirit of our fathers who came to the wilderness to escape European autocracy so dead that it will endure this forever? Gentlemen, do not mistake the signs of the times. You may try to raise false issues and blame the Department of Justice, but thinking people will know better. If you believe that the tenure of the judiciary should be a life tenure, pass some legislation which will make it possible for the legislative and executive branches to dismiss judges who nullify the laws for the purpose of granting protection to the trusts. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of the legislation for adjusted compensation of the ex-service men of the late war during the past week has led to the discussion of our national finances, the high cost of living, and soundness of our revenue policy during the war. In attempting to arrive at correct conclusions, in fairness to ourselves and to our constituents, let us look squarely in the face the facts in regard to our national finances, high prices, and the policy of raising the necessary revenues. Let us proceed in a calm manner to examine figures, facts, and causes.

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES.

We are now considering the last of the great supply bills, the sundry civil appropriation bill. When the first supply bill of this session was reported out from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, of which I am a member, in my speech of January 10, 1920, I discussed in detail our national expenditures—past, present, and future. I then emphasized the necessity for the strictest public economy if we would avoid a national calamity. The people demanded economy, and this Republican Congress pledged itself to enact budget legislation and to make appropriations for the maintenance of the Government on a sound business and economical basis. As the last supply bill is now before the House carrying appropriations for the next fiscal year, it is appropriate to call to the attention of the country how much this House has saved from the administration estimates. This I can best do by placing in parallel columns in the RECORD how much the administration asked and how much this House allowed.

The 13 regular annual appropriation bills for 1921.

[Statement showing the amount of the estimates for each bill and the amount of each bill as passed by the House.]

Name of bill.	Total of estimates.	Bills as passed by House.

This table shows that we have saved the taxpayers of the country the sum of $1,480,338,434.59 by cutting down the appropriations asked for by the administration. One thing is certain, that before we can reduce the burden of taxation and commence paying off our vast national debt that is now weighing so heavily on the backs of the American people we must expend less in running and maintaining the Government. The table speaks for itself. The picture is before you and shows savings as follows:

Name of bills and the savings.

Agriculture	$17,427,503.00

A grand total saving of	1,480,338,434.59

The appropriations of $2,110,953,592.58 made by this House for the next fiscal year do not represent the total expenditures for the ensuing year. To this sum must be added about $1,000,000,000 interest on the national debt and $278,000,000 for the sinking fund. Making allowances for deficiencies, the national expenditures for next year, due to the economies of this House, should not exceed the sum of $3,500,000,000. The estimated revenues for next year are $5,000,000,000, which will leave a balance in the Treasury of $1,500,000,000 to pay on the floating debt represented by Treasury certificates.

The national expenditures for the fiscal year 1916, the year before the war, were $1,072,894,093.23, or in round numbers $1,000,000,000. For next year the estimated expenditures will be three and a half times that amount, and therefore some of our Democratic critics charge this Republican House with failure to live up to our program of economy. Let us analyze that proposition. We have reduced the estimates presented by a Democratic administration about one and one-half billion dollars, so the criticism falls flat coming from the mouths of administration Democrats. If there were a Democratic House to carry out the demands of the administration the estimated expenditures for next year would be $5,000,000,000 in place of $3,500,000,000.

Let us go into this subject a little further, because the figures will reveal an interesting story. The appropriations of $2,110,953,592.58 for next year carry over $300,000,000 for the benefit of soldiers of the late war, provided for them under the war-risk insurance act, vocational-education act, the Sweet bill, and others. These appropriations for the next fiscal year also carry for the Army and Navy, notwithstanding the fact that this House reduced the administration estimates for the Army and Navy $763,697,976.80, the sum of $479,318,651.11 in excess of the expenditures for the Army and Navy for the fiscal year before the war. Now, add the interest on the national debt, the sinking fund, the benefits to soldiers, and the increases for the Army and Navy, all of which were inherited from the war, and we get a sum of over $2,000,000,000. Deduct this sum from $3,500,000,000, the estimated expenditures for next year, and we have left less than $1,500,000,000. And when you take into consideration that the Government, like the individual, will have to pay double for everything it buys, every fair-minded person must concede that this House has made a most remarkable record in restoring the Government expenditures back to normal for the next fiscal year. For the year following further reductions can be made.

Besides economy in Government expenditures, the people are demanding some relief from tax burdens and the elimination of some of the more obnoxious and irritating tax laws. With a probable surplus of $1,500,000,000 for next year, the House should address itself in earnest to the problems of revising our tax laws and adopting a permanent policy looking toward the payment of the national debt. This House very properly first addressed itself to the problem of reducing the national expenditures, because that had to be solved before the other problems could be seriously considered. The people and the business of the country have a right to expect and demand that we tackle these other problems without delay. With the legislation now in conference providing for a national budget, and which will soon be law, this House and the Republicans at the Chicago convention ought to give to the country a definite program, so the people will know what they will be expected each year to contribute to the maintenance of the Government and the reduction of the national debt, and thus permit every legitimate business enterprise to adjust itself accordingly on a permanent and certain basis. Nothing, in my judgment, that we can do will do more to restore the business of the country to a normal basis than such a program.

HIGH PRICES.

Recently there has much been said about the effect of the taxes on the high prices, and the natural inference from some of the speeches is that the taxes are chiefly responsible for prevailing high prices. There is no denying that taxes do affect the prices, and some taxes have a more pernicious effect along that line than others. But this element of prices has been discussed pro and con by other gentlemen, so I proceed to analyze some other elements of high prices that have received but little mention.

One element or cause of high prices is underproduction. By statute law you can not convert a shortage into a surplus. A surplus can be created only by increased production. According to the Secretary of the Treasury the total war expenditures from April 6, 1917, to January 31, 1920, were $33,789,647,860.30. War means destruction, and most of this entire amount represents an economic loss. During the war the industries turned their endeavors from production of instruments and commodities of peace to instruments and commodities of war. We are now reversing that order, but we can not in a day or a year even restore the prewar order. When normal conditions are restored and the supply again equals or exceeds the demand, then and then only will the high prices caused by underproduction be restored to normal.

There is a great deal of waste and added cost to the consumer due to our system of distribution. The difference in the cost of production, especially of farm products, and the cost to the ultimate consumer is out of proportion to the service rendered in distributing the products from the producer to the ultimate consumer. What we need in this country are more producers and fewer distributors. Farmers are now asking Congress for legislation to permit cooperative marketing of their products without being subjected to the penalties of the antitrust laws. I am assured that this legislation granting the desired relief will be reported soon. Whatever waste can be elfminated and deadwood cut out of the complex processes of distribution will inure to the benefit of both producer and consumer.

Another cause—and a very flagrant one—for high prices is that profiteering which got its impetus during the war is still permitted to run rampant in all lines of trade. The war laws are still in effect, including the food law of August 10, 1917. These, together with other laws, confer on the executive department of this Government the power to regulate prices and to prevent hoarding, profiteering, and every illegal combination in restraint of trade. The last Congress and this Congress—the one Democratic and the other Republican—have passed every additional law requested by the President and the Attorney General to eradicate the evils of profiteering. Last August, with a blare of trumpets, the Attorney General announced to the country that he was starting out after the profiteers, and asked an expectant public to stand by and watch prices drop. The Attorney General has accomplished nothing, and the people's hopes for relief have been aroused in vain.

Take the sugar situation. The Sugar Equalization Board, controlled by the President, although it had ample authority given it by Congress, neglected and refused to buy the Cuban sugar crop in time and allowed it to be bought up by the British and exported to Europe. Now sugar can only be bought at extravagant prices.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. My time is so limited that I regret I can not do so now. If I get through with what I want to say before my time expires, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Congress has provided the laws. The laws are on the statute books to be enforced. Congress passes the laws, but it is the duty of the President to enforce and execute the laws. The Constitution itself provides "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." It is an old saying, "You can lead a horse to water, but you can not make him drink." As good old Pontoppidan says, "The law is good when it is enforced as a law."

INFLATION OF THE NATIONAL CREDIT.

Another contributing cause to existing high prices is the inflation of credit during the war. Nearly every well-known economist of this country at the beginning of the war warned the Executive and Congress against the evils of inflation that were sure to follow if the war was financed chiefly by bonds instead of chiefly by taxation; in other words, they held that conscription should apply to wealth as well as to men. This warning was not heeded. Inflation naturally followed. Just before the war our national debt was less than a billion dollars. Now our national debt is over $26,000,000,000, chiefly in bonds. There is only one possible way to overcome the inflation caused by this vast increase of our bonded indebtedness, and that is to commence to pay off our national debt. We still have those among us who advocate that this debt should be passed on to future generations to pay, but their number is fewer and their influence less and less. I helped to make this debt and I want to pay off my share of that debt, so I, with you, can turn this grand old country of ours over to our children with a clean slate.

Within the last two weeks Austen Chamberlain, chancellor of the British exchequer, in his speech before the House of Commons on the budget, made the prediction that Britain will wipe out her national debt in 20 years. Great Britain has a war debt of $40,000,000,000 and a national wealth of $80,000,000,000. We have a national debt of $26,000,000,000 and a national wealth of $250,000,000,000. Surely if Britain under those circumstances can pay off her national debt in 20 years we should be able to do no less.

INFLATION OF CURRENCY.

It is a well-known economic truism that the more money there is in the country the higher the prices. The general stock of money in the United States on July 1, 1914, was $3,738,620,345. This included gold coin and bullion in the Treasury, gold certificates, standard silver dollars, silver certificates, subsidiary silver, Treasury notes of 1890, United States notes, and national-bank notes. The general stock of money in the United States on April 1, 1920, was $7,761,146,018, or an increase over July 1, 1914, of over $4,000,000,000. The stock of money on April 1, 1920, included in addition to the circulating medium on hand July 1, 1914, Federal reserve notes and Federal bank notes. The circulation of money per capita in the United States on July 1, 1914, was $34.53, and on April 1, 1920, it was $55.56. These facts speak for themselves and every citizen can draw his own conclusions.

EXPANSION OF BANK CREDIT.

The bank credit of the country has increased from 1914 to 1919 about $14,000,000,000. Further, on this subject I quote without comment facts and warning from the statement by a special committee of the Chamber of Commerce, State of New York, issued April 1, 1920, as follows:

From the beginning of the war to the present time $18,000,000,000 in the form of increases in circulation and in bank deposits have been added to the medium in the United States. On the other hand, the physical volume of business was only fractionally more in 1919 than in 1914. The production of buying medium has accordingly been increased in overwhelming ratio to the production of goods. The rise of prices has borne with particularly disastrous effect upon the purchasing value of a fixed income, it having been cut in half in six years.

Again, the committee says:

Banking and currency expansion was an uneconomic and regrettable process, indeed, but unavoidable during the war.

Again, I quote:

The consequent result has been the huge inflation of bank credits and currency which is considered as one of the main factors responsible for the rise in the general price level.

Recommendation and warning of the committee:

That bankers and business men should cooperate in a strong effort to combat further expansion of bank credits or additional issue of currency.

The additional issue of currency is in the control of the Treasury and the expansion of bank credits chiefly in control of the bankers. The findings and recommendations of this committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce should not go unheeded.

I have presented these facts for the reflection of this body and of the country. Unless we operate this Government on a sound and economical basis, unless the necessities of life are brought within reach of the consumers' ability to pay, and unless bankers and business men will heed the warnings of such eminent authority that I have just quoted, there will be proposed, in and out of Congress, half-baked theories and wild-eyed schemes that will far outdistance those of the fiat money advocates after the Civil War, who were going to pay off the national debt with a printing press, by the simple process of giving the bondholders greenbacks for their bonds.

WAR-MADE WEALTH.

Now, in raising revenues to pay either the expenditures of the Government, the adjusted compensation for ex-service men, or the national debt we must go where the money is, and in so far as possible call upon those persons who, because of the war, profited greatly for their fair share of the contribution. I realize fully that there have been many reckless statements made in regard to war profits, but that many persons and corporations took advantage of war conditions to make unconscionable profits and amass fortunes can not be denied.

In a carefully prepared speech, delivered April 24, Senator CAPPER, of Kansas, called the attention of the country to the Attorney General's failure to prosecute the profiteers and produced figures from the Wall Street Journal and other reliable financial authorities showing percentages of profits of large financial concerns during the war. Here are a few of them upon the authority of a United States Senator:

Continental Oil, 200 per cent; United Fuel Gas, 200 per cent; Ohio Fuel Supply, 100 per cent; Nonquit Spinning Co., 100 per cent; Amoskeag Cotton Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; Stutz Motors, 100 per cent; Nashua Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; American Tobacco Security Co., 75 per cent; Manomet Mills, 55⅝ per cent; Hood Rubber Co., 66⅔ per cent; Crucible Steel, 50 per cent; Cleveland-Akron Bag, 50 per cent; Union Bag and Paper, 50 per cent; Auto-Car Co., 40 per cent; John R. Thompson Co., 33⅓ per cent; St. Maurice Paper Co., 30 per cent; F. W. Woolworth, 30 per cent; Electric Welding of Boston, 25 per cent; Delaware & Cleveland, 25 per cent; Hawaiian Pineapple Co., 25 per cent; Electric Welding Co., 25 per cent; General Chemical Co., 20 per cent; American Multigraph, 20 per cent; Truscan Steel, 20 per cent.

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has recently increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $30,000,000, giving its stockholders a stock dividend of 2,900 per cent.

Repeatedly the statement has been made recently on the floor of this House, and without any denials, that 23,000 new millionaires were made in this country during the war. If that statement be true, then that number of men accumulated during the war at least $23,000,000,000, or nearly as much as this country became involved in debt to win the war. I am calling your attention to this rock of national resources, from which, if you will smite it, abundant streams of revenue will burst forth. And if you accept this source of revenue there will be no increase in the cost of living if the Attorney General will enforce the laws against profiteering.

THE SALES TAX.

Now, the purpose of adjusted compensation for the ex-service men is in part to equalize their present economic condition brought about by the loss of opportunities to make money because of their service in the Army or Navy with the economic condition of those who, because of the war, received large financial remuneration and amassed fortunes. This can not be accomplished by taking as much from the poor man as from the rich man. Any scheme of taxation to raise revenues for any purpose which seeks to tax the necessaries of life instead of the profits and the wealth accumulated out of the war is unjust, inequitable, and indefensible. For that reason I am unalterably opposed to the sales tax.

A sales tax will come out of the pockets of the masses, including the ex-service men. The National Industrial Conference Board recently made the following astonishing revelation in regard to the increase in cost of living:

Item.	Increase July, 1914, to November, 1918.	Increase July, 1914, to March, 1920.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Food	83	109
Shelter	20	43
Clothing	93	177
Fuel, light, and heat	40	49
Sundries	55	83
All items	65	94.8

Every dollar collected by sales taxes will be added to the cost of living of every family in the land. The larger the family the more the head of that family will contribute to the raising of the national revenues. This is a scheme to tax the breakfast table instead of the incomes of the rich. Besides, this scheme will make a Federal revenue collector out of every retail merchant in the land. The inconvenience and irritation this will involve in itself condemns the entire sales-tax scheme as not only unjust but vicious. Certainly the Ways and Means Committee can devise some other scheme of taxation.

Men say on the floor here that if we undertake to raise additional revenues chiefly from those most able to pay that these men will immediately stick up the price and thus add to the cost of living. That is not only an admission that these men will do that thing, but that they have the power to do that thing, and that the Government lacks either the power or the courage, or both, to stop them. Gentlemen, that is a sad and damaging admission. What you grant by that admission is the very thing that every Bolshevist and radical is preaching from one end to the other of this broad land. Gentlemen, I do not believe it. I will not admit that there is an invisible and irrespondible government in this country more powerful and dominating than the Government of which we are a part.

There are many schemes being proposed for new taxes to take the place of existing taxes. The sales tax is only one of them. There is now before the Ways and Means Committee a bill—known as the Nolan bill—to tax real estate values. If this bill becomes a law, it will impose additional burdens upon nearly every home and farm in Iowa. I am opposed to that bill. It is a capital tax on land, and in my opinion is unconstitutional as well as unjust.

Gentlemen on the committee having the responsibility to report out revenue measures will be able to frame a bill to tax war-made wealth. That is exactly what the British Parliament proposes to do. Permit me at this point again to quote from one of the most conservative British statesmen, Austen Chamberlain, chancellor of the British exchequer. The press dispatch of the speech I referred to awhile ago says:

The chancellor exploded a bombshell in the business world by announcing an increase in the excess-profits tax of from 40 to 60 per cent, though he promised a reduction when the Government has drafted a plan for special taxation of fortunes amassed during the war.

Over in England the Government has experts at work to draft "a plan for special taxation of fortunes amassed in profits during the war," and I do not hesitate to prophesy that that plan will be worked out, that it will be put into operation, and that it will do the business for the British Government. Here some gentlemen say it can not be done, and if we try it those who are taxed will ruin the country. Gentlemen, I say it can be done, and our Committee on Ways and Means, with its expert assistants, can point the way. There is and can be no doubt of the justice of the proposition that war-made wealth should bear the heaviest burdens of taxation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the requests of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, before we begin the reading of this important bill, appropriating millions and millions of dollars, I think we ought to have more than 25 Members present.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, we have more than that.

Mr. BLANTON. How many more than that have we? I just counted 25.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Quite a number.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman assure me that there are more than 25? If so, then I will withdraw my suggestion of no quorum.

Mr. GOOD. I would state to the gentleman that we have been very liberal with regard to general debate. There are a number of items that we are approaching now that are not very important, and we desire to get on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. No rules have been prepared to make items in order that are out of order?

Mr. GOOD. No. None that I know of.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the circumstances, if the gentleman wants to appropriate a number of million dollars with 25 Members present, I withdraw the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, CONSTRUCTION, AND RENT.

Alexandria, La.: For additional for rent of temporary quarters for the accommodation of Government officials and moving expenses incident thereto, $4,000.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, insert "Alexandria, La.: For enlargement, extension, etc., of the United States post office and court building, $135,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order for a little while?

Mr. GOOD. I will reserve it for five minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I recognize that it would be parliamentary for this item to come through the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I also recognize the reasons for not having a general building bill at this time; but it seems to me not good business or economy for the Government to be niggardly in these 15 post-office cases that have been urgently presented to the Congress by the Treasury Department and also by the Post Office Department showing very grave congestion and suffering. The situation at Alexandria is one of the most serious in the United States. The building was constructed 25 years ago, when the population of the city was 2,000, and it is now nearly 25,000. Seven years ago an appropriation was made of $65,000 to enlarge this old building. It is still unexpended. The building has no heat, water, or sewerage facilities. It is an out-of-date and completely inadequate structure. During seven years the Treasury Department three or four times has undertaken to let a contract to enlarge the building. The plans and specifications were presented and the lowest bid was $15,000 above the appropriation. The architect then cut down the plan, again advertised, and the lowest bid was about $19,000 above the appropriation. Finally they cut out the second story and undertook to remodel the lower story. Still the lowest bid was some $20,000 above the appropriation. When this was being done the Government had to lease a building for the occupancy of the post office in order to permit the old building to be remodeled. After the post office had been removed to the temporary building there was a failure to get a contract to remodel the building with the funds at hand. The post office is now located in a temporary shack, and the Government is paying $4,000 a year rent. The confusion, the congestion, and the inadequacy of the quarters are not easily described. So, gentlemen of the committee, the Treasury Department is entirely correct in presenting to this Congress 15 emergency cases throughout the country. This is one of the 15. There are other urgent cases, possibly, but this one is worthy of your immediate consideration. It would be economy to the Government to grant this request. I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to withhold the point of order and let this post office and court building be reconstructed, so that it can be occupied. The Federal court is now meeting in the parish courthouse. The post-office building is unoccupied and stands there useless, not even being used for storage purposes. A private enterprise using such methods as the Government is adopting in this case would promptly go into bankruptcy. So, gentlemen of the committee, I am presenting a reasonable case when you consider that this post office is in the heart of the city, a shack of old red brick, the black spot of the city, with a million-dollar hotel two blocks away, with a 10-story new bank building by the side, another 8-story bank building on the corner, with the population increasing ten times since the building was constructed, with 7 railroads, with $15,000,000 annually of manufacturing done in the city, the geographical center of the State, the fourth city of the State, and with a post-office building that would be a reflection upon a village of a thousand people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ASWELL. I appeal again to the gentleman not to make the point of order against this amendment.

The following reveal the seriousness of the Alexandria situation:

MARCH 15, 1920.

The SPEAKER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to a letter addressed to you under date of March 4, 1920, submitting a list of 15 estimates of appropriation (H. Doc. No. 673), I have the honor to submit herewith another item to be considered in connection therewith, as follows:

Alexandria, La., post office and courthouse:
That the limit of cost for enlargement, extension, etc., be increased from $65,000 to $200,000, which additional amount is hereby appropriated $135,000

NOTE.—The foregoing item was not included in the previous list, as it appeared from information at hand at that time that the condition existing at Alexandria could only be met by the construction of a new building.

Since the submission under date of March 4, 1920, the Post Office Department has submitted information (see copy of letter from the Postmaster General, dated Mar. 8, 1920, hereto attached) to the effect that the situation is so serious that it is imperative something be done at once to relieve the condition. This can best be accomplished by providing an extension to the present building.

The act of March 4, 1913, made provision for enlarging and extending the present building, at a limit of cost of $65,000, which amount has already been appropriated. To provide an extension at the present time to meet the needs of the service will entail an expenditure of $200,000, or an appropriation of $135,000, in addition to the amount now available for that purpose.

In view of its importance and urgency, it is recommended that favorable consideration be given to this matter.

Respectfully,

DAVID F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

MARCH 8, 1920.

Hon. DAVID F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

SIR: On the 16th ultimo you advised this department that due to the apparent great necessity for certain public building work it had been decided to call the attention of Congress to the urgency of the situation, but that before doing so you wished to be furnished with an expression of opinion as to the order of preference which should be given to 30 important cases, based upon the seriously congested postal conditions reported to exist at the places named.

This information was communicated to your department in a letter dated February 24, and in that letter the project at Alexandria, La., was placed No. 9 in the order of urgency. It seems, however, that only 15 projects were brought to the attention of Congress and that none of the projects involved the construction of an entirely new building, and as a new building was recommended for Alexandria, the name of that city was not included in the public building work recommended to Congress.

The act of March 4, 1913, authorized the extension of the post office building at Alexandria at a limit of cost of $65,000. Plans were drawn and proposals for the construction of the extension were first requested in April, 1917, and only one bid was received, amounting to $70,000. In addition to this amount, $10,000 was considered necessary to provide for contingencies such as vault shelving, post office boxes, etc. Due to the necessity for furnishing some relief plans were revised upon the basis of a smaller and cheaper extension, which was thought might be constructed within the amount available. Under these plans two proposals were received in January, 1918, the lower being approximately $73,000 and the higher $80,000. If it had been possible to accept the lower of these proposals the extension which would have been built would not have furnished additional accommodations needed for the courts, but would have provided only for the relief of the post office. Proposals were again requested for the extension of this building on the plans providing for the relief of the post office only on January 7, 1919, and the lowest bid received amounted to $84,000, or approximately $19,000 in excess of the amount available for the work. Reports on file show that the condition of the post office building at Alexandria are particularly deplorable, probably worse than most any place in the country. The quarters are entirely inadequate, and while the post office was domiciled in the building it was necessary to use the attic, where the heat in summer is almost unbearable. The building is practically without toilet facilities.

At the time the work was placed upon the market in January, 1918, proposals were requested for rented quarters. Conditions were such that it was impossible to obtain a building already erected, and the proposals submitted provided for the construction of a building for the use of the Government during the period of the extension work. While it was considered doubtful whether proposals could be obtained for the construction of a Government building which it would be possible for your department to accept, you nevertheless found it necessary to secure rented quarters for use in case the remodeling of the post office building could be undertaken. It was impossible to obtain the consent of the party submitting the proposal to furnish temporary quarters to hold his proposal open until it could be definitely determined whether the extension of the post office building could be made within the amount available. Accordingly you accepted the proposal for rented quarters at once and the post office has been located in those quarters at a rental of $300 per month since June 16, 1918.

As bearing on the growth of the postal service at Alexandria, it may be stated that the receipts for the salary adjustment year ended March 31, 1914, amounted to $65,805, while the receipts for the calendar year ended December 31, 1919, amounted to $102,190.

Inasmuch as the cost of construction work has undoubtedly increased since your former estimate, it is probable that the construction of an extension at this time will involve an expenditure approximating $200,000. As the temporary quarters are unsatisfactory and considering further that no provision has been made for the rental of temporary quarters after the expiration of the current fiscal year, it is urgently recommended that the conditions set forth above be brought to the attention of Congress at the present session with a view to obtaining an appropriation sufficient to cover the cost of providing the required extension to the post office and courthouse building at Alexandria.

Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Alexandria, La., March 8, 1920.

Hon. J. B. ASWELL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DR. ASWELL: In compliance with your recent request (by wire) for a statement of the crowded and inadequate post-office building and facilities in this city, I beg to submit the following:

As you know, we are now occupying temporary quarters in a one-story building located in Murray Street, in the middle of the block. The building has a frontage of 50 feet and a depth of 100 feet, with 4,700 square feet of working space, 300 square feet being taken up with the lobby and postmaster's office.

The windows through which all business is transacted are totally inadequate for the purposes intended, and should be just twice the number.

The money order, postal savings, registry, parcel post insured, and C. O. D. is transacted through three windows, with four clerks, who, on account of lack of space, are continually elbowing each other, and makes it difficult for them to remain within their respective divisions.

The general delivery and stamp windows are also too closely connected, and with hardly sufficient space for the clerks to pass each other.

In order to transact war-savings business it has been necessary to utilize the postmaster's office, leaving the head of the office without any private office room.

The following windows are necessary for the prompt and efficient handling of the public at an office of this size:

Money-order division, two windows and 400 square feet of working space.

Stamp division, two windows for the sale of postage stamps, war-savings stamps, and revenue stamps, and 200 square feet of working space.

Postal savings division, one window. (This division could be handled through the money-order division.)

General delivery, two windows and 400 square feet of working space.

Registry division, one window and 400 square feet of working space.

Parcel-post division—insured and C. O. D.—for the receipt and delivery of all parcel post, should have at least two windows and not less than 1,000 square feet of working space.

War-savings stamp business and revenue stamps could be handled through one of the stamp windows.

The mailing division, for the receipt and dispatch of mails, occupies one-half of the entire working space; and within this division it has been necessary to place the city delivery division and the rural letter carriers.

The mailing division should have at least 2,800 to 3,000 square feet of working space, and the city delivery and rural letter carriers 800 square feet of working space.

The toilets are located in the same space, and in full view, and are inadequate for the number of employees—15 regular clerks, 2 auxiliary clerks, 6 city letter carriers, 3 rural carriers, and 10 to 15 railway postal clerks who enter this office.

The location of the building, in the center of the square, with buildings on each side, seriously interferes with the necessary ventilation, there being only four double windows on one side. It also seriously interferes with the light, and it is necessary to have artificial light continually.

The mails, incoming and outgoing, have to be trucked from the side street through an alley, which in rainy weather makes it very disagreeable, and frequently is the cause of getting the mails wet.

There has been no provision made for any space to keep fuel and all necessary articles used in cleaning a building of this kind, and as a result the fuel is out in the weather, and other necessary articles are kept within the office.

The floor is of concrete, and is damp throughout the year, which is detrimental to the health of the employees. The vault now in use for storing stamps and other stamped paper is practically useless because of the damp condition existing.

The lock-box equipment is not sufficient. We now have 764 boxes, and we have a waiting list of 75 to 100. Our box equipment should not be less than 1,000.

I am transmitting herewith a blue print showing the floor plan, which will give you a fair idea of what we are up against, always remembering that every bit of space is taken up with everything that is necessary in the operation of a first-class office, such as desks, cases, bag racks, letter-carrier cases (city and rural).

Incidentally, I wish to mention that the monthly rental on this building is $330. This amount does not include light, water, or heat, as this is furnished by the Treasury Department.

Yours, very truly,

JONAS R. ROSENTHAL,
Postmaster.

During this year the city council has received many petitions from property owners seeking to have streets paved.

Since the signing of the armistice the building of homes has taken a healthy spurt, and the building and loan associations of the city have all the applications they can accommodate.

On June 17 the citizens of the city voted to issue $525,000 in bonds with which to make many necessary municipal improvements, such as extension of water and sewerage mains, additions to street railway systems, and erection of a gas plant and mains for distribution.

To date 57 miles of hard-surfaced gravel roads have been constructed in the parish, and the people on the 1st day of July voted a good-road bond issue of $2,000,000 to build 203 miles more of road, and thus complete 260 miles of hard-surfaced roads in the parish.

Agriculture in the surrounding country is prospering. In 1914 this parish produced 7,800 bales of cotton. In 1918 it produced 26,000 bales. In addition, the farmers are diversifying and are engaging largely in the culture of grain and the raising of hogs and cattle. Many large plantations are being sold in small tracts, insuring a larger rural population of thrifty white farmers.

The city of Alexandria has favorable geographical location for a large city. It has grown steadily for the last 20 years, a growth that is substantial and steady; no boom. Property values have steadily increased and have not been inflated above their true value.

The demands of business in the city are much greater than the post-office facilities offer here now.

We believe this city will continue to grow in the future as it has in the past, and that the post-office building should be of adequate construction to anticipate this growth for years to come.

ALEXANDRIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
A. T. FELT, General Secretary.

[From the Louisiana State Journal, Nov. 28, 1919.]

ALEXANDRIA'S POST OFFICE.

It is claimed by conservative people that Alexandria has a population of some 25,000. It is claimed by conservative people that the post office of Alexandria does not provide facilities for a population of 2,500.

The present site of the post office of Alexandria and the size of the post office is a matter that naturally worries the post-office employees to a great extent.

The wonder of it is that the employees do as well as they do under the trying conditions they labor under.

The city of Alexandria has outgrown its present post-office standard. It has advanced to such an estimation in the State's public opinion that we receive favorable mention from everywhere, but the post-office situation would remind one of the rural district village office.

The needs of a population of 25,000 for superior mail systems can not be fully accommodated under the existing conditions.

The local post-office force is handling more mail, inward and outward bound, than the post office of New York in proportion to units, zones, and population. In that city there are suboffices that handle much of the Empire State's mail, while in Alexandria, a city with tremendous commercial possibilities, present great industrial activities, publishing houses, large wholesale and splendid retail department stores, that are expending thousands of dollars advertising their respective business affairs—and incidentally Alexandria—are forced to put up with a country-size post-office department that is neither a joke nor a standard unit.

Why the needs of Alexandria should be shelved so far back that 12 years have slipped by without anything being done in the matter is one of those administration puzzles that only time can unfold.

Be that as it may, Alexandria should put her shoulder to the wheel of Federal machinery and pound away everlastingly for the improvement of local post-office facilities.

The local post-office employees would welcome new sanitary quarters and a larger breathing space to do the work they are so well fitted for.

ALEXANDRIA, LA., January 16, 1919.

Hon. J. B. ASWELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DOCTOR: The bids for repairs for post office here were just as expected, about $15,000 more than the amount appropriated. It seems that the Government increased the appropriation a little but added more to the work than the increased appropriation would take care of.

It looks to me that the Government is using very poor judgment in hanging fire on appropriating enough to do the work and paying rent while this is going on. The amount that they are paying in rent for the quarters they now occupy would more than take care of the difference between the cost of construction and the amount appropriated.

The service at the post office here now, is if anything worse than it used to be in the Government building. I can't see where the Government has benefited itself or the public either in moving into a rented building and leaving their own building unoccupied.

I wish you would look into this matter and see if the department won't either change their construction so as to be within the appropriation or increase the appropriation so as to put in the improvements they want. The general public is certainly entitled to adequate facilities for handling their mail in a place as important as Alexandria. The present location of the Government building is not only the most desirable in town but there is nothing else that can be had would get as much space as the Government now owns, where the present building is now located.

The Government owns a half square of ground which is more than they can buy anywhere else in the business section of the city, neither can they buy anything like a half square of ground anywhere near the business section for the price that they could sell their present location.

I trust you will look into this matter and see if it isn't possible to have the appropriation increased from $65,000 to $80,000 or $85,000, as I understand $81,000 was the lowest bid they had.

Thanking you for any relief you can give us in this matter, I am,

Very truly, yours,

W. D. HAAS.

FINAL REPORT OF GRAND JURY.

Hon. ALECK BOARMAN,
Judge of the District Court of the United States,
Western District of Louisiana:

We wish to bring to your honor's attention the totally inadequate accommodations for the use of the court in the Federal building here in Alexandria. Your grand jurors were huddled in a room in a little better than a garret under the eaves of the building. It does seem to us that this great and prosperous country would afford better accommodations to those who serve it. The witnesses are compelled to stand in a cold hallway in winter and an extremely hot one in summer. We understand the same conditions prevail in the postal department of the building—the building being entirely too small for the large needs of this district.

We wish to call your honor's attention to the following matters which seem to need urgent and immediate attention, to wit:

Heating matters throughout the building: As to court room, the large stove smokes so badly that it can not be used successfully, and when an effort is made to get up a fire the smoke makes the room intolerable, and prevents the court from being made comfortable for those attending the sessions of the court. There is no method whatever for heating the hallways, and witnesses are compelled, for lack of a witness room, to stand in the hallways and subjected to hardships.

The clocks do not run. This applies to all clocks on second floor, in the court room, United States marshal's office, United States clerk's office, and United States attorney's office and judge's office, as well as to grand-jury room on the third floor.

The plumbing for the wash basins is seemingly in bad order and unsanitary. In some of the basins the water barely runs; drips.

The carpets in use in the court room, clerk's office, judge's chambers, United States attorney's office and marshal's office are, all of them, worn out and ragged and very unsanitary. Conditions in this respect could not well be worse.

There seems to be difficulty in heating the grand-jury room and a total lack of lighting facilities on the entire third floor, thus preventing the grand jury from holding night sessions if desired. There does not seem to be a single electric globe on the entire third floor.

There is a total lack of all toilet accommodations inside the building. There seems to be a rough outhouse, wholly inadequate, to reach which jurors, witnesses, court officers, attorneys, and others have to pass through the rain and to climb a fence. This condition is very bad.

Inasmuch as there is no witness room, or a room in which a petit jury can be taken for its deliberations, some provision might properly and readily be made to enable the witnesses to sit down in the hallways on the second and third floors. The grand-jury witnesses should be accommodated with benches, which could be placed in the hallways, and so be at the call of the grand jurors. As it is now, the witnesses all stand all day long, for several days, in the hallways. A dozen benches might be placed in the hallways, some on the second and some on the third floor, and this should be done as soon as practicable, as the conditions stated are bad. In the hallway on the third floor there stands a large amount of trash and supplies. This could be moved to some other place, and ample space would be provided for the benches for the grand-jury witnesses.

Much of the furniture throughout the building is old and in poor repair and should be renovated. This applies especially to some of the tables, chairs, etc., in the court room in bad condition. The water coolers, such as are now in use in the building, in the various offices, are old and unsanitary, and apparently the use of them would be dangerous to health. This might be remedied by securing promptly modern sanitary water coolers at small expense.

The above report is not meant in any way as a reflection on the custodian of the building, who, we are sure, has done all in his power with the facilities at hand.

We respectfully request that copies of this report be mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Congressman from the eighth district of Louisiana, and to our Senators.

Respectfully submitted.

J. P. TURREGANO,
Foreman Grand Jury.
LEROY B. GULLOTTA, Clerk.

Filed February 10, 1914.

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Alexandria, La., February 12, 1916.

Hon. J. B. ASWELL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ASWELL: The mailing division is greatly handicapped for the lack of working space and frequently have to resort to the ledges around the window to properly separate their letter mail. The rack for working paper mail is totally inadequate for the purpose, and the working space is so limited that the clerks strike each other when in the act of throwing the paper to its proper sack.

The city carriers' division is located on mezzanine floor, erected just above the mailing division, and has sufficient space for four men; but there are five city carriers and three rural carriers located in that small space, and when separating their mail the quarters become so close and foul that they are compelled to leave and seek the fresh air for 10 minutes at a time. As a matter of fact, one of the carriers has been overcome on several occasions as a result of the foul air. An enlarging of this division is absolutely imperative. The parcel-post division, one of the most important branches of the service, is handled through the general delivery and registry divisions, and results in congesting those two divisions.

Last, but not least, the lobby, the portion of which has been curtailed to make additional room, is so small that the patrons, after being waited on, have to back out of the door to avoid trampling on the feet of other patrons waiting to be served.

I had almost forgotten to mention the fact that we have no room for transit mails, and when handling large quantities of bulky mail, such as catalogues, we have to resort to the sidewalk and stairway leading to the court room.

The lock boxes, 598 in number, are all rented, and we have applications on hand for 25 more and are receiving applications daily. The office should have at least 1,000 post-office lock boxes.

In a word, the building is totally inadequate for the proper conduct of the business of this office, and immediate action should be taken to remedy the evil.

Yours, truly,

LEO A. TUNEGANG,
Assistant Postmaster.

BUILDING IN ALEXANDRIA.

Alexandria is liable to annex Colfax, Boyce, Pollock, Pineville, Bunkie, and other surrounding towns as its suburbs if building operations now under way in the thriving Rapides capital are continued at the same rapid rate for a few years. While the high prices of materials have halted the erection of homes and business and public buildings in a great many places, Alexandria folks are going ahead building up their city. They are making room for newcomers and new businesses.

A recent published record of the building progress in Alexandria shows $525,000 is being spent for municipal improvements. These include an artificial-gas plant, $175,000; extension of the sewer system, $95,000; improvement of the drainage, $40,000; city jail and courthouse, $75,000; improvements in the water supply, $75,000; improvements to the street railways, $40,000; and new city stables, $25,000.

Among the other city improvements are: Contract let for 3 miles of brick paving, 1½ miles of gravel, and 4 miles of sidewalks, to cost $300,000. On July 1 a parish-wide bond issue for building 260 miles of graveled roads was carried, and amounts to $2,000,000. These roads will soon be under construction.

A score of business buildings are going up, including a $600,000 10-story bank and office building; Baptist Sunday school building, $85,000; garage, $40,000; stores, warehouses, theaters, and additions costing from $2,000 to $5,000 each.

Residences are being built by the dozen. The report says it is impossible to enumerate all of them, but 18 new houses are listed as under construction, costing $1,500 to $8,000 each. More are being contracted for every day. In fact, Alexandrians are planning to spend around $165,000 this year building new residences for new people to live in.

Take notice, Shreveport. Do something; build some houses to take care of the hundreds of new people who desire to locate here.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the situation at Alexandria, La., is not what it ought to be, and neither is it in a great many other places in the United States. Many millions of dollars have been appropriated already for public buildings and can not be expended because of high prices, and the committee in reporting out this bill cut it between $70,000,000 and $80,000,000 on account of construction work that can not be done unless the Government is willing to pay two or three or even four prices and enter into competition where there is a scarcity of material and labor and simply add to the confusion. We have to treat all alike. There is a post office in my district in the same situation, and they all must take their places on the same equality. This amendment increases the limit of cost, as I recall, about $135,000. Now if we are to commence in one district increasing the limit of cost, I submit we must follow the same course in reference to other districts.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield.

Mr. ASWELL. I beg to suggest that it is not a proposition to erect a new building——

Mr. GOOD. I understand that. It is for a very extensive addition.

Mr. ASWELL. As in other cases. It is simply making one habitable which is already constructed.

Mr. GOOD. It is the same. There are many districts where they have no post office at all, and where appropriations have been authorized, but they can not get the building built within the limit of cost but must have double the amount appropriated to get a building. Now, I submit to the gentleman if we are to adopt a policy it must be made uniform. The policy in the gentleman's district must be the policy in the district of the gentleman from Illinois and so on throughout the United States.

Mr. ASWELL. The Treasury Department has made a specific and earnest appeal for 15 cases of the worst need in the United States.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; they made a specific estimate for some 15 or 16 cases, and 300 Members made specific appeals for that many other post offices in their districts, and they are entitled to be heard just as the Treasury authorities are; and I submit to the gentleman that unless we adopt a policy that is uniform we are going to have a good deal of trouble and will subject ourselves to great criticism.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The suggestion of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee is not treating the gentleman from Louisiana harder than he did the gentleman from Missouri, who felt so piqued about not getting his $500,000 for St. Louis that he would not let the chairman even introduce this bill the other day. I approve of the chairman treating them all alike.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for one more statement?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. I wish to state to the chairman of the committee that the cantonment has been removed from Alexandria, La., and there is no shortage of labor there. You would find the cost very reasonable.

Mr. GOOD. I have newspaper clippings from that part of the country, where bricklayers are now receiving $1.37½ per hour.

Mr. ASWELL. That is in the city.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes. But that city of yours that you are talking about has a great congestion, and I suppose the cost of labor is as high or higher there than in other places.

Mr. ASWELL. But there are more laborers there.

Mr. GOOD. Yesterday in the Star there was an item showing where the carpenters in Philadelphia have agreed with the contractors on their scale of wages, and the contractors are paying them $60 a week, and with the overtime agreed to there they will be entitled to $80 a week. I submit, with that abnormal condition confronting the country, the Public Treasury ought not to compete with the wants and demands of a man for a home. We ought not to enter the contest. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to withhold it for just a second.

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. You do not have to go to Philadelphia. I have a notice showing where the plumbers at Wichita Falls, Tex., down in the same country that the gentleman from Louisiana comes from—that is, in the South—are asking $15 a day, requiring a helper, and then they prescribe that they can not put up more than two heaters a day in a building, where they used to put up 30 a day. So the conditions down in the South are the same as in Philadelphia and elsewhere.

Mr. GOOD. The committee simply felt that it ought not to enter into competition with private employment where the demands are so excessive. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana. Evidently it is not authorized by law, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Now, gentlemen, if the committee is going to follow this rule, then, of course, we will not have any complaint—that is, if they are going to treat us all alike. Now, my district comprises nine counties, with not a public building in the entire district, although from that district comes into the Treasury of the United States as much money, from oil taxes, as probably any district in the United States, except the largest cities, like New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago. Now, the thing that I am complaining about is that while we were requested not to press any applications for public buildings, yet the departments in Washington have been going ahead and erecting enormous, fine buildings. The Treasury Department, while it was asking us to wait and not press the erection of public buildings for which appropriations had already been made, was constructing a large annex and erecting a large building here for the War Risk Bureau, two magnificent buildings in Washington, and there has been an enormous lot of building by the departments of the Government while the country has been requested all the time to be patriotic and not ask for public buildings, and not insist on those that had been appropriated for.

Now, appropriations had been made for my district, but not a building erected in the entire district, and the business men acceded to the request of the department and said they would not insist on any building being constructed while the stress of war was upon us. But these same men are insisting that these appropriations for other public buildings throughout the United States be curtailed. Now, this bill carries here large appropriations for the construction of buildings under the head of repair. I want to voice my protest against the continuation of the building program. If the taxpaying part of this country is to be ignored, then let the departments confine their operations in the buildings that they have and in accordance with the condition that the Treasury is in at present.

I want to ask the chairman of the committee what amount is carried in this bill for construction work to be used in buildings in Washington?

Mr. GOOD. Practically nothing. There is an item with regard to putting a new roof on the Treasury Building. We were advised that when it rains hard it is necessary to put pans and receptacles around to catch the water, and they said that while they were doing that they wanted to change the form of the roof so as to make provision, as I recall, for about 21,000 feet of space that they need there, and if the work is to be done at all it ought to be done then. Now, the additional amount necessary for them was very small, but the Treasury Building is a large building; the roof was put on a good many years ago, and it was apparent that we could not safely postpone it another year. There is not a dollar that I can recall, except to make repairs, which the departments have estimated are absolutely essential.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does this bill carry any money for the construction of any new buildings throughout the United States which have been denied by the building committee? Does the gentleman know whether it includes any new buildings?

Mr. GOOD. It carries, as I recall now, two items for additions to marine hospitals and may carry one or two minor items.

Mr. McKEOWN. No post office or court buildings?

Mr. GOOD. No. We carry in here an appropriation, quite a large one, $330,000, giving the Treasury Department some discretion with regard to the expenditure of it, but it can not spend more than $20,000 on any one building. There are some places where the congestion is so great that it has been necessary to make some additions to public buildings. But in the main the committee did not engage upon a building program at all. The bill in this respect is simply a maintenance bill. The amount carried for maintenance is large, but the gentleman must recall that we have millions of dollars invested in public buildings, and that some of them are old. These buildings are undergoing some repair all the time. There are nearly 1,200 of those buildings and the repair expense is large.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKEOWN. Now, is there any reduction made in the department that has to do with the Supervising Architect's Office? If there are going to be no new buildings erected, no appropriations made for buildings, then will the Supervising Architect's department require the same appropriation it has always required?

Mr. GOOD. The department estimated for the same amount for the supervisors of construction, because there is money available heretofore appropriated for buildings now in the course of construction.

The only thing that this committee, in reporting out this bill, refused to do was to change the limit of cost and enlarge it and appropriate more money. There are millions of dollars, appropriated in the last and prior bills, available for public buildings, and which will be available just as soon as contracts can be let within the limit of cost. But we had nothing to do with that situation. Now and then a contractor will take a contract where local conditions are such as to permit him to enter into contract within the limit of cost.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have been informed that the number of contracts are very few.

Mr. GOOD. They are.

Mr. McKEOWN. Because the increased cost of construction exceeds the amount authorized by law. I was wondering whether there was any reduction in the appropriation for that department in view of the fact that there are over 150 buildings that can not be built.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman's inquiry was along the line of the inquiry made by the committee, and the Treasury Department seemed to feel that they ought to have that money available, and they would not expend it unless conditions changed so as to permit them to go on; and if conditions changed so as to permit them to proceed, they could let the contracts within the limit of cost and go ahead. If we had cut out the appropriations for the supervisory force in connection with construction, then the work could not proceed in case contracts were let within the limit of cost. We wanted to be fair with the department. If they can let the contracts within the limit of cost, they should have the appropriation and also the appropriation for the necessary supervisory force. Certainly they will not use the money if they have no work, but they will have work without question.

Mr. McKEOWN. I regret very much that the situation is such that you can not bring in these appropriations and allow these buildings to proceed. Yet I want to compliment the gentleman on being fair and on treating us all alike, so that we have no ground for complaint against the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Phoenixville, Pa., post office: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay from amounts heretofore appropriated for the purchase of a site and construction of a building for post-office purposes at Phoenixville, Pa., a sum not exceeding $17,500 for the purchase of a suitable site.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not this a new item?

Mr. GOOD. No. This is an item where there was an appropriation for $16,000 for a site. The property was condemned. In the condemnation proceedings the award of the jury finally was $17,500.

Mr. BLANTON. The building is about finished now?

Mr. GOOD. I got that impression, but I must be mistaken in that regard; but the building is to be constructed within the appropriation. But the former appropriation fixed the limit of cost of the site at $16,000. The extra $1,500 will be deducted from the cost of the building.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For relocating fence on the Fourteenth Street side of the building, $3,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Where is this auditor's building?

Mr. GOOD. It is the building formerly occupied by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is a very large building, and there is a very insanitary condition existing there with regard to sewerage.

Mr. WALSH. On what part of Fourteenth Street is it situated?

Mr. GOOD. It is down across from the Agricultural Department, in Potomac Park.

Mr. WALSH. Where is it proposed to relocate the fence?

Mr. GOOD. The relocation of the fence is necessary because they are widening the street. That work is now going on, and the fence will simply have to be placed back a sufficient distance to permit the widening of Fourteenth Street.

Mr. WALSH. Does it involve a change of grade and ground there? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Washington, D. C., Treasury Building: For additional amount for remodeling fourth story, in order to provide additional accommodations, and for new roof for entire building, $240,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. With all of the unnecessary building space now in the city of Washington, is it necessary to expend this $240,000, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. GOOD. That is for the Treasury Building. That building was built a good many years ago and the roof is in poor repair.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but the gentleman overlooks this provision: "In order to provide additional accommodations." They have just completed a very large, magnificent Treasury Annex just across the street from the Treasury.

Mr. GOOD. This is a very large building, and by a comparatively small expense additional space can be secured.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it to house the unnecessary clerks who are still drawing pay, on the pay roll, that we have not been able to separate therefrom?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the Treasury Department is still occupying rented buildings. The prohibition enforcement division is housed altogether in a rented building. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman ever been over Washington to see just how many vacant buildings there are now that were put up during the war?

Mr. GOOD. Vacant buildings?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Has the gentleman ever been out toward the District jail, in the southeast, for instance?

Mr. GOOD. No; I have been traveling in another direction. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the gentleman ought to go out there sometime and see the public buildings that were put up out there by the Department of Labor, for instance, that have never had anybody in them, about two blocks of them out there, building after building. Not a single soul has ever occupied them. God only knows what they were intended for; I do not.

Mr. GOOD. The committee would like to have postponed this work for another year at least. The Supervising Architect, however, painted a very dark picture with regard to the building. The gentleman will, of course, realize that it is not economy if a roof of a building like this is leaking and the water is coming in every time it rains not to repair it.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking about the roof. I am talking about these additional accommodations.

Mr. GOOD. The only purpose is to raise the roof at the eaves, so as to give a little more headroom, and put the new roof on top. Now, if that work is done at all, it ought to be done before the new roof is put up; and the new roof is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think we could put this off for a year or two?

Mr. GOOD. We have put it off now for two or three years on account of the war, and if the committee had felt that it could have been postponed for another year the item would not be put in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. We are patching our pants and our clothes. Can they not patch this roof?

Mr. GOOD. They have been doing that, and they commenced to patch the roof before the gentleman commenced to patch his pants, and the roof has got beyond the patching point.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman thinks it is absolutely necessary?

Mr. GOOD. I was impressed with the necessity of the appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Relief of contractors: For an additional amount for the payment of claims of contractors, etc., arising under the act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended, $1,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation and not authorized by law.

Mr. GOOD. The item is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Almost every appropriation bill that we bring in here has an item of this kind appropriating an additional amount for these contractors. This is the third such item that we have had up here this session.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. That is because the act approved August 25, 1919, made provision to pay the contractors on public buildings their actual losses sustained because of war conditions on contracts that were let before we declared war. Now we have appropriated $1,000,000 for that purpose. The Treasury Department asked for $1,750,000, but of that amount we transferred $500,000 to the previous deficiency bill and disallowed $250,000 more, on the theory that during the next year the Treasury Department would not be able to make settlements under that act requiring more than $1,000,000. The claims aggregate something over $3,000,000 that are now pending in the Treasury Department.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman state how the amount in the bill was arrived at?

Mr. GOOD. The amount was arrived at after hearing the Supervising Architect. His office asked for $1,750,000. Because of the urgency of the matter we transferred $500,000 of that estimate to the pending deficiency bill. That left $1,250,000. The committee were of the opinion that all the pending claims would not be adjusted during the next fiscal year, and that not more than $1,000,000 would be required to pay these claims during that time. I will say to the gentleman that that must necessarily be something of a guess. It was the guess of the committee that of the amount estimated $250,000 would not be required during the next year.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. This item is practically a claim which ordinarily would be cognizable by the Committee on Claims of the House, would it not?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why not?

Mr. GOOD. Because the legislation provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall adjust and pay these claims. The Claims Committee has nothing to do with it. We enacted legislation in the last session of Congress to take care of these contractors, and the Secretary of the Treasury is given the power to adjust and settle the claims.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Under that act does the Secretary of the Treasury fix the amount?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And the amount in this bill now under consideration is the amount fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GOOD. It is a lump sum, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to pay in accordance with his awards.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What was the amount?

Mr. GOOD. One million dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Remodeling, etc., public buildings: For remodeling, enlarging, and extending completed and occupied public buildings, including any necessary and incidental additions to or changes in mechanical equipment thereof so as to provide or make available additional space in emergent cases, not to exceed an aggregate of $20,000 at any one building, $330,000.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order against the item that it is new legislation unauthorized by law.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this item is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman cite us to the law that provides for this appropriation?

Mr. GOOD. These are completed and occupied buildings, occupied in the main by the Post Office Department. I think in the interest of good administration, even if it was subject to a point of order, the gentleman would not make it. Here is a post-office building where, because of certain unusual conditions, because perhaps of a fire when Congress is not in session, because of a storm, or because of the discovery of an oil well in some small town where it was necessary——

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. I knew the gentleman would.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his point of order.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what was done with reference to the recommendation of the Secretary that we have $50,000 for a Federal building at El Paso?

Mr. GOOD. We struck it out on the theory that some work that would be necessary at El Paso could be taken care of out of this appropriation, so as to make the first floor available for some of the other departments there, and with the general repairs of that building which are essential it would be all that was now necessary. The gentleman from Texas made a clear and forceful explanation before the committee, and the committee would have liked to have reported an appropriation to do the work, but because of the very abnormal cost and the fact that there were so many buildings in the same condition, especially new construction, where we would have to enlarge or limit the cost, we carried this basket clause to take care of cases of that kind where, in the opinion of those who have the administration of the public buildings in their charge, they can use that fund where it is most needed.

Mr. HUDSPETH. As I understand, it was the sense of the committee that El Paso should come out of this fund.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; the absolutely needed alterations.

Mr. McKEOWN. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman if this appropriation is made for any particular places? That is, if there are certain places that are to be included in this appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. Not in detail. It could not be. This year they have $220,000 for such purpose, and it was pointed out to the committee that by the expenditure of that money in many places great relief came to the Post Office Department.

Now, take the El Paso case. There is a case where the Government has built a new building. The old post-office building is available now for other governmental activities that are renting places in the city of El Paso. The second floor is used for a court and the third floor is used for customhouse service, I believe. The first floor ought to be made available for some of these activities, and if it is made available I do not know that it will take $20,000 or more than $10,000, but they will have to put in some temporary provision to make that big space in the old post-office room available to house some of the governmental activities, and it was pointed out that it would save several thousand dollars a year in rental. They asked for $50,000 for the work. We did not allow it. There were many places where they asked for money but we did not allow it. The department will fall back on the appropriation.

Mr. McKEOWN. The amount arrived at was an estimate made by the Treasury Department?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. We refused to grant money for specific places, except in one or two places where the health of the employees was involved, and placed all alteration items in this appropriation.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to say to the gentleman that these amounts probably will be all right with the limitation on each particular place, but this department ought to be very careful in the amount allowed because it should remember that in rented quarters for post-office purposes throughout the United States great congestion prevails, and insanitary conditions, and that they can not get any relief from the Post Office Department or an increase of rent. Those who furnish buildings are unable to furnish adequate buildings, and so if these people who have Government buildings are kept down to the absolute and necessary repairs there can be no fault found with the bill. They ought to be held down strictly to the limit because there are thousands of post offices in the United States in rented buildings that are absolutely insanitary.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman if this money to be expended is entirely for buildings outside of Washington?

Mr. GOOD. They expect to spend it all outside of Washington.

Mr. TILSON. I noticed when at the Treasury the other day that they were remodeling some places in the basement of that building. A little later they had money counters in there and it seemed to me an unfit place for work to be done. I wondered if it was necessary, with all the buildings in Washington, for them to use basements where artificial light must be used all the time for such important work as counting money.

Mr. GOOD. They have a general repair fund of $20,000 that is available for that purpose, but this fund here would not be available for that purpose.

Mr. TILSON. I wondered if $240,000 for the accommodations on the fourth story was not to obviate using these places where no man ought to be called upon to work, especially as everything must be done in artificial light.

Mr. GOOD. It will make provision for 21,000 feet of space, which ought to give relief.

The Clerk read as follows:

Baltimore, Md.: For purchase of property, $176,775.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The appropriation of $176,775 contained in this bill for the payment of the quarantine station at Baltimore, which has been in the possession of the Government and operated by the Public Health Service since April of 1918, is indeed highly gratifying and deeply appreciated. On April 1, 1918, the mayor of Baltimore telegraphed the Public Health Service, saying:

A strike of the engineers and firemen at quarantine ties up our quarantine inspection. Is the Government ready to take this quarantine property over?

He asked this because the authorities of the Government had appraised it and signified the intention of the Public Health Service taking it over as far back as October, 1916. The department telegraphed the mayor, saying:

Department is willing to take over and operate Baltimore quarantine station immediately on basis of lease at nominal sum. Funds not yet available, however, for reimbursement of city for property. This item is included in pending legislation, to be effective July 1 if favorably acted upon by Congress.

The legislation was not favorably acted upon, and since that time we have been endeavoring to have the Government pay for the station as agreed upon. I was fearful for some time that the mayor had made a mistake in wiring the department on April 1; it really began to look as if it were an April fool joke, and that Congress never would appropriate the money to carry out the agreement. It is therefore very pleasing that this sundry civil bill carries the appropriation.

The amount appropriated was arrived at by appraisers appointed by the mayor of Baltimore under an ordinance passed in 1916, authorizing the sale of the Baltimore quarantine station to the National Government and by the supervising superintendent on behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury. These appraisers arrived at the sum of $176,775, as shown by the following report, duplicate of which was sent the Public Health Service:

OCTOBER 25, 1916.

The honorable the BOARD OF ESTIMATES OF BALTIMORE CITY:

GENTLEMEN: Complying with the request contained in the resolution of your honorable board, passed October 18, relative to the appraisal of land and buildings of Baltimore quarantine station, we have the honor to report that after a careful investigation of all the property, a comparison of values thereof, we have arrived at the conclusion that the land, the buildings, and appurtenances thereon and therein are, in our judgment, worth the net sum of $176,775, divided approximately as follows:

Buildings, wharf, retaining walls, etc	$90,687
Floating property, consisting of 1 tug and 1 gasoline launch	24,500
Implements, live stock, household furniture, etc	3,138
Water, light, and power plants	8,250
20 acres of land, at $2,500 an acre	50,000
One small parcel of land	200
Total	176,775

Respectfully,

THOS. J. LINDSEY,
HARRY E. GILBERT,
On behalf of the city of Baltimore.
N. V. PERRY,
Supervising Superintendent,
On behalf of the Treasury Department.

It will be noted that the Government has been in actual control and operation of this quarantine station since April of 1918, and since October of 1916 the contract has been practically closed between the Government and the city of Baltimore. We have awaited the payment of the fund as agreed upon. This quarantine station prior to the war, and until it was turned over to the National Government, not only paid its operating expenses, but there was some considerable surplus, at times equal to a very fair return upon the investment. I am not aware as to what has taken place since the Government took it over, but rather imagine it has not made as good returns, owing to the war and conditions in reference to commerce.

Baltimore, as was shown by Surg. Gen. Blue's letter of June 13, 1918, had never been anxious for the Government to take over the quarantine station and had never pushed negotiations for the sale of it to the Government. The National Government has become the owner of some 67 quarantine stations of the country, embracing all except that at New York and Baltimore and several minor ones on the Mexican border. The purchase of the quarantine station at Baltimore is highly essential at this time. The city not being in control thereof and knowing that the Government intends to keep it, it has not been in position to make repairs and to maintain the property as it should be. The Public Health Service has not seen fit to expend money upon repairs and necessary maintenance because the National Government has not had title thereto, and for the further and more essential reason no appropriations have been made for this purpose by reason of lack of ownership.

I hope it will not take very much money to put the station in good shape, but had this condition of affairs lasted for any considerable period longer it is my firm conviction that repairs would have been absolutely necessary and money for that purpose would have had to come from some source. It is one of those cases where a stitch in time saves nine. I say, therefore, not only for the National Government but for the city of Baltimore, it is highly gratifying the Government has seen fit to close its deal and pay for the property which it purchased. Some one will ask upon what authority does the Appropriation Committee make appropriation for this purchase? In answer to this, I beg to refer to the act approved June 19, 1906, which gives full authority for the purchase of the quarantine stations of the country:

Section 5 of the act approved June 19, 1906, being an act to further protect the public health and make more effective the national quarantine, provides:

"That in any place where a quarantine station and plant is already established by State or local authorities it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, before selecting and designating a quarantine station and grounds and anchorage for vessels, to examine such established stations and plants with a view of obtaining a transfer of the site and plants to the United States, and whenever the proper authorities shall be ready to transfer the same or surrender the use thereof to the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to obtain title thereto or possession and use thereof, and to pay a reasonable compensation therefor, if, in his opinion, such purchase or use will be necessary to the United States for quarantine purposes and the quarantine stations established by authority of this act shall, when so established, be used to prevent the introduction of all quarantinable diseases."

Furthermore, as I have said, all the other stations of the country have been taken over and paid for some years ago, and there has never been any objection on the part of Congress to those payments.

The Clerk read as follows:

The schedule of fees and rates of charges in effect at the New York Quarantine Station at the time of the transfer of the title thereto to the United States shall be adopted and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury as the schedule of fees and rates of charges for the operation of the said station and all other maritime quarantine stations under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I should like to have an explanation from the chairman of the committee particularly with regard to the two last lines in the paragraph, lines 6 and 7 on page 5, in which it is provided that existing charges for the operation of the New York quarantine station shall be made applicable to all maritime quarantine stations under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, Congress passed the act a few years ago to take over all of the quarantine stations in the United States. I think at practically all of the stations a certain schedule of fees and charges were enforced by State institutions or local authorities. For example, the State of New York for a number of years, as the gentleman knows, has been operating the quarantine station there, and they have a schedule of fees that are charged for fumigation of vessels and for other like services.

Mr. DUPRÉ. As I understand it, for instance, they have charges for inspection which are not applicable to other ports. I have no objection to this paragraph in so far as it makes effective at New York the schedule of charges that now exists there, but I do question whether, without any further information on the subject, the phraseology in lines 6 and 7 making the charges, as I read it, that now obtain in New York applicable to all other quarantine stations should be allowed to remain in the bill.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that if a foreign ship comes into the harbor of New York with a smallpox patient on board, the rule is that the ship must be fumigated. The quarantine station there performs that service, which costs a good deal of money. The charge that is made is not enough or more than enough to pay for the expense. If a ship of that kind should go into the harbor of New Orleans, does not the gentleman think that there should be charge for the fumigation of the ship?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Certainly. I have absolutely no objection to that, but the charges might be different in New York or Boston or Philadelphia. Incidentally I do not care to have it assumed or suggested by the gentleman that all of the smallpox that comes into this country may come into the port of New Orleans. So I adverted to Boston and Philadelphia.

Mr. GOOD. Last year at the port of New York the quarantine station received for that kind of service $362,255. We are taking over these stations, and should take them over with their assets and not their liabilities alone.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I have no intention of making the point of order against the whole paragraph. I am entirely willing that a ship coming into the port of New York should pay into the Treasury the amount that it now pays to the State of New York for the quarantine service; but without any knowledge of how this rather elastic provision is going to apply—and from a hasty reading of the hearings I found no discussion of this at all—it is my intention to make the point of order against the provisions in lines 6 and 7, extending same to other ports on the New York basis of local charges, as being unauthorized by existing law and new legislation.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman does that I wish to inform him that we are taking over by this bill the New York quarantine station at a cost of $1,395,000, and that we are taking over the Baltimore station also. We have already taken over the station at Boston, and there is no objection in these localities, so far as I know, to the imposition of this charge.

Mr. DUPRÉ. But the gentleman does not understand that if the imposition of this charge were limited to those localities I would not have the slightest objection, if its representatives approved; but the way the paragraph reads it provides that the schedule of fees and rates of charges now in effect at the New York quarantine station shall be adopted and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury as the schedule of fees and rates of charges for the operation of all other maritime quarantine stations under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Why should the schedule effective in New York be made applicable to other ports when it may be the schedule of charges is lower in other ports? I understand, for instance, that the present schedule in New York includes inspection fees in addition to fumigation, while at other ports the inspection fees are not included in said charges.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It also includes an inspection of immigrants at $5 for the first hundred and $3 for every succeeding hundred.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I do not think the gentleman should insist upon putting through a provision of this character, and I therefore make the point of order against the language contained in lines 6 and 7 of the first paragraph at the top of page 5 as being new legislation.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman make the point of order——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Then I hope the gentleman will make the point of order to the words in line 6, "and all other maritime quarantine stations."

Mr. DUPRÉ. Very good. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the words "and all other maritime quarantine stations," in line 6, page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, by the acceptance of the House of the quarantine station at New York City, for the first time the Government of the United States will do the real inspecting of immigrants when they arrive from Europe. For a long number of years that burden has fallen upon the State of New York, and it has cost the State of New York several million dollars to perform the work which the Government should have been doing. Heretofore the Public Health Service has been a secondary force in inspecting arrivals at New York, and it is fitting and proper that the Federal Government should do it. The immigration law for a number of years provided the inspection should be done by the Government, but the Government relied upon the State of New York to do it under its own doctors and at its own expense. With typhus spreading, as it is in Poland, to the extent of over 150,000 cases at the present time, it is extremely important that the Public Health Service realize what is before it, and this House to-day is taking the kind of progressive action which should have been taken long ago. It is belated justice to the people of the State of New York, who have been carrying the burden of expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. The responsibility that New York has suffered by reason of being a great port and a great metropolis has also had its features of benefit. For instance, every citizen of Texas who has a little more money to spend than he has use for and wants to take a trip to Europe usually has to go first to New York and spend a week or two there before he sails, and when he gets back he has to spend another week or so there and spend his money, which, after all, benefits New York.

Mr. SIEGEL. And he has a pretty good time, but New York has paid 40 per cent and still pays 40 per cent of all the taxes of this country.

Mr. BLANTON. And carries the paper of the other States upon which it makes from 4 to 6 per cent?

Mr. SIEGEL. It has also successfully carried the burden at the same time of looking out for arrivals, including our Texas friends who come from Europe and come into that great port. Once they come to New York they always want to come again.

Mr. BLANTON. I admire the great metropolis almost as much as the gentleman.

Mr. SIEGEL. I hope the gentleman will learn more about it as time goes on. They say such things and they do such things in New York, but everyone agrees that there is only one New York, as loyal and as patriotic as any city in the United States of America.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, REPAIRS, EQUIPMENT, AND GENERAL EXPENSES.

Repairs and preservation: For repairs and preservation of all completed and occupied public buildings and the grounds thereof, under the control of the Treasury Department, and for wire partitions and fly screens therefor, Government wharves and piers under the control of the Treasury Department, together with the necessary dredging adjacent thereto, buildings and wharf at Sitka, Alaska, and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in renting said wharf, require that the lessee shall make all necessary repairs thereto; care of vacant sites under the control of the Treasury Department, such as necessary fences, filling dangerous holes, cutting grass and weeds, but not for any permanent improvements thereon; repairs and preservation of buildings not reserved by vendors on sites under the control of the Treasury Department acquired for public buildings or the enlargement of public buildings, the expenditures on this account for the current fiscal year not to exceed 15 per cent of the annual rentals of such buildings: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated not exceeding $200,000 may be used for Government-owned Public Health Service hospitals and quarantine stations and completed and occupied outbuildings, including wire partitions and fly screens for same, and not exceeding $25,000 for the Treasury, Treasury Annex, Treasury Annex No. 2, Arlington, Liberty Loan, Butler, Winder, and Auditors' Buildings in the District of Columbia: Provided further, That this sum shall not be available for the payment of personal services except for work done by contract or for temporary job labor under exigency not exceeding at one time the sum of $100 at any one building, $900,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman if there is any supervising architect at the Treasury yet?

Mr. GOOD. There is not.

Mr. WALSH. What is the need of carrying a provision in this bill "to be expended under the supervising architect" when we have not had one for the last four or five years and when there is no such official?

Mr. GOOD. We have an acting supervising architect.

Mr. WALSH. Then why do you not say acting supervising architect?

Mr. GOOD. Well, it may be that before this appropriation will be expended we will have a supervising architect and then you would have a provision in the law that the appropriation would have to be expended under the direction of an acting supervising architect.

Mr. WALSH. There does not seem to be any great danger of that, because the gentleman in charge of this bill and his predecessor on the other side made the same statement. The gentleman who is acting as supervising architect down there is the executive officer of this department. As far as I know there has been no nomination sent in of a supervising architect and there does not seem to be any likelihood there will be now. If this great department can function for three or four years without one and can draft plans for buildings and erect them without any supervising architect I think we can eliminate a supervising architect and provide that it shall be carried on by the executive officer, and I wondered if the gentleman had made any inquiry into this to ascertain whether there is ever going to be a supervising architect.

It is rather peculiar, taking into consideration the vast number of appointments that have been necessarily made under war conditions, that they have not filled this very important place. I think a little later you carry a provision for an additional salary of $1,000. And still the place remains vacant. Has the gentleman ascertained through any inquiry as to the likelihood of this place being filled?

Mr. GOOD. I have no more knowledge with regard to that than has the gentleman from Massachusetts. I know the vacancy has existed for a long time, and the Secretary of the Treasury did not come before the committee with regard to the matter. Of course, the condition ought not to continue in this way, but what was the committee to do? The committee does not appoint the Supervising Architect.

Mr. WALSH. If the committee carries $1,000 additional salary, and if there is not any official there, and there has not been for three or four years, and there is a likelihood there is not to be, why carry a provision in the bill?

Mr. GOOD. You may have a new Secretary of the Treasury on March 4, 1921, and he may appoint one, or the present Secretary of the Treasury may appoint a supervising architect, and then if he does, of course, the provision in the bill ought to be just as it is written. Now, the gentleman will realize, of course, that the committee is not acting in an administrative capacity in any sense. All we can do is to assume that the executive officials will carry out the provisions of the law and appoint the necessary officials that the law provides for. And it is on that theory that the bill was drawn.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I can see that the gentleman shows great appreciation. He knows that that assumption has not been carried out in the last three or four years?

Mr. GOOD. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. If the energetic gentleman from Massachusetts has been able to find one position here in the Government which is vacant, I hope he will not insist on its being filled, because it is the only vacant position in the Government that I have ever heard of.

Mr. WALSH. I think that is quite a valuable discovery, but why make an appropriation for it here? Why make an appropriation for an increase of salary for a vacant position?

Mr. BLANTON. That is just usage and custom.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum here.

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. BLANTON. We are going to have a lot of time tomorrow.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that if he expects Congress to complete its work so that it could adjourn around June 5——

Mr. BLANTON. We are going to have three-day recesses while waiting on the other end of the Capitol, and we will not have anything to do.

Mr. GOOD. No; we are not.

Mr. WALSH. I hope the gentleman will permit the reading of a few more pages. There are not many controverted items.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to execute and give effect to the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stat., p. 537): For additional salary of $1,000 for the Supervising Architect of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1921; foremen draftsmen, artchitectural draftsmen, and apprentice draftsmen, at rates of pay from $840 to $2,500 per annum; structural engineers and draftsmen, at rates of pay from $840 to $2,500 per annum; mechanical, sanitary, electrical, heating and ventilating, and illuminating engineers and draftsmen, at rates of pay from $1,200 to $2,400 per annum; computers and estimators, at rates of pay from $1,600 to $2,500 per annum; the expenditures under all the foregoing classes for which a minimum and maximum rate of compensation is stated, not to exceed $143,450; supervising superintendents, superintendents and junior superintendents of construction and inspectors, at rates of pay from $2,000 to $3,500 per annum, not to exceed $240,000; expenses of superintendence, including expenses of all inspectors and other officers and employees, on duty or detailed in connection with work on public buildings and the furnishing and equipment thereof, and the work of the Supervising Architect's Office, under orders from the Treasury Department; for the transportation of household goods, incident to change of headquarters of supervising superintendents, superintendents, and junior superintendents of construction, and inspectors, not in excess of 5,000 pounds at any one time, together with the necessary expense incident to packing and draying the same, not to exceed in any one year a total expenditure of $7,500; office rent and expenses of superintendents, including temporary stenographic and other assistance in the preparation of reports and the care of public property, etc.; advertising; office supplies, including drafting materials, specially prepared paper, typewriting machines, adding machines, and other mechanical labor-saving devices, and exchange of same; furniture, carpets, electric-light fixtures, and office equipment; telephone service; not to exceed $6,000 for stationery; not to exceed $1,000 for books of reference, law books, technical periodicals, and journals; not to exceed $10,000 for transporting drawings, miscellaneous supplies, etc., for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department; contingencies of every kind and description, traveling expenses of site agents, recording deeds and other evidences of title, photographic instruments, chemicals, plates, and photographic materials, and such other articles and supplies and such minor and incidental expenses not enumerated, connected solely with work on public buildings, the acquisition of sites, and the administrative work connected with the annual appropriations under the Supervising Architect's Office as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order or approve, but not including heat, light, janitor service, awnings, curtains, or any expenses for the general maintenance of the Treasury Building, or surveys, plaster models, progress photographs, test pit borings, or mill and shop inspections, $489,050.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph—the language on page 8, lines 20 and 21, for additional salary of $1,000 for the Supervising Architect of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1921. Apparently there is no authorization for increasing that salary, and it has been carried for several years. We do not get any official under it. That either ought to be increased, so that they can find a man to accept the place, or else we ought to save a $1,000 appropriation in that way.

Mr. GOOD. The former Supervising Architect did receive this $1,000 additional. The legislative bill carries $5,000 for this position. You can not employ a Supervising Architect of the ability requisite to do that work for $5,000. I do not know but that the gentleman is right that $6,000 is too small. That amount has been carried for a long time. I am sure they would not be able to get a Supervising Architect if this were taken out. I do not know that they will be able to select the right kind of a man for $6,000. It is subject to a point of order; but it has been carried in the bill for a number of years, just as we are carrying it here, with the hope that a Supervising Architect could be secured and would be appointed who is capable of doing this work and doing it in a satisfactory way.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stated it had been carried for a number of years, but they have not secured a man.

Mr. GOOD. They had a man.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Wenderoth was the last one. That was about four or five years ago. One of the difficulties, I assume, has been that during the war they could not get a gentleman at this salary, but before the war they were not able to get a man even for $6,000. Now, in that event, does not the gentleman think we ought to provide an adequate salary, so that they can get one, or, if they do not intend to get one, to really increase the salary of the very capable and estimable gentleman down there who has been performing this work?

Mr. GOOD. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury did not appear before the committee, nor has he made an estimate that it was necessary to appropriate more money to get the right kind of a man. I do not know why the Secretary of the Treasury does not appoint a supervising architect. I will be frank with the gentleman. I do see, however, some objection to striking this out, because if in the future some Secretary of the Treasury should desire to appoint a supervising architect, by striking this $1,000 out and leaving the salary at $5,000 we might prevent his doing that very thing.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it ought either to be increased to $7,500 or $8,000, in order that an appointment might be made, or it ought to be eliminated, because I do not think it will effect anything.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Would it not be fairer to pay the salary to the man who is doing the work?

Mr. WALSH. I said that. He is not an architect, however, although he has been able to carry that office along for four years, practically doing the work.

Mr. GOOD. He is a lawyer by profession. He has been doing part of the work and is an able man. He is not an architect at all and does not profess to be one.

Mr. WALSH. I think I shall insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. One of the items embraced in this $489,050 is "typewriting machines." I want to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that there is a report going around the Capitol here that within one of the departments there were lately found stored away several thousand new unused typewriting machines. Does the chairman know anything about that?

Mr. GOOD. I understand that is the case. The subcommittee on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill made that discovery.

Mr. BLANTON. Why is it necessary for us to buy new typewriting machines when there are several thousand of them stored away?

Mr. GOOD. They will have to buy them from that source. Under the law no department of the Government can buy new typewriting machines until this surplus stock is all exhausted. While it takes an appropriation to provide for their purchase, this provision must be enforced.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know anything that would prevent a department from buying these typewriting machines from some typewriter company instead of from these departments having surplus ones?

Mr. GOOD. Not a dollar is available this year for buying new machines from an outside concern. All of the money must be appropriated for the purchase of these machines that are declared to be surplus until that stock is exhausted. This money would not be available for the purchase of machines from the outside.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice another item, "mechanical labor-saving devices." What is the necessity of Congress appropriating continually in every bill of this character in every Congress for labor-saving devices when our employees will not permit the Government to use them?

Mr. GOOD. They are using them.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman surely knows that we have a lot of labor-saving machines now in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing which would save much labor on the part of men and women, and yet they can not be used because the employees in that particular building will not permit the Government to use them.

Mr. GOOD. The Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing stated before the committee that they are using all they have down there that are in a usable condition; and with regard to these labor-saving devices they are largely punching machines and adding machines and counting machines, which are really labor-saving devices.

Mr. BLANTON. Some day, if the chairman should have an hour's time unoccupied, I would like to take him down there and show him those machines.

Mr. GOOD. I shall be very glad to go with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Furniture and repairs of furniture: For furniture, carpets, and repairs of same, for completed and occupied public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of marine hospitals, quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, and for gas and electric lighting fixtures and repairs of same for completed and occupied public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including marine hospitals and quarantine stations, but exclusive of mints, branch mints, and assay offices, and for furniture and carpets for public buildings and extensions of public buildings in course of construction which are to remain under the custody and control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of marine hospitals, quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, and buildings constructed for other executive departments or establishments of the Government, $625,000: Provided, That the foregoing appropriation shall not be used for personal services except for work done under contract or for temporary job labor under exigency, and not exceeding at one time the sum of $100 at any one building: Provided further, That all furniture now owned by the United States in other public buildings or in buildings rented by the United States shall be used, so far as practicable, whether it corresponds with the present regulation plan for furniture or not.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. McKEOWN. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee how much is estimated for the purchase of carpets in this paragraph for public buildings?

Mr. GOOD. The estimate was $18,000. There are, as I recall, about 1,200 buildings, and 9 new buildings that the Government will take possession of and occupy during the next fiscal year. The estimated amount does not seem to be excessive.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that Members of Congress on account of the exceedingly high cost of carpets are willing to forego the purchase of new carpets in their offices, and in view of the extraordinarily high cost of carpets, which are a luxury now—very much of a luxury—these departments ought not to be permitted to spend large sums for the purchase of carpets as the price is almost prohibitive. For the House Office Building there was an appropriation granted by the gentleman's committee to put in some very much needed carpets, but the officers in charge of the building, after consulting the market, informed the Clerk of the House that the price had enormously increased, and I think the Clerk of the House is to be commended because he did not buy any carpets under those conditions. If Members of Congress are willing to put up with the old carpets, these departments ought not to be permitted to spend large sums of money for the purchase of new carpets.

Mr. GOOD. The amount in the bill would not permit the purchase of more than $15 worth of carpet for each of the 1,200 buildings, so the gentleman can see that there is not very much extravagance there.

Mr. McKEOWN. The trouble is that these gentlemen will not buy $15 carpets.

Mr. GOOD. Then they will have to do without.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of all necessary employees, other than employees required for the administrative work of the bureau of the class provided for and specified in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920, and plate printers and plate printers' assistants, $2,357,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, including $8,400 for custody of dies, rolls, and plates: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denomination than those that may be canceled or retired, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act "To define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if we are going to pause on this section I will make the point of no quorum present. We can finish this to-morrow just as well as we can to-day.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman withhold his point, to allow me to ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold the point of order for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals of the bill. Is there objection?

REFERENDUM ON PROHIBITION IN OHIO.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no petition to present, but I wish to make a statement that may give some information that we do not seem to get otherwise. I have seen no notice taken in any of our papers here or any of the large papers of the country as to the result of the recount being had on the prohibition amendment referendum in Ohio. I have a statement from an Ohio paper under date of April 27 saying:

Margin eliminated in the recount of the Ohio referendum on prohibition. Drys obtained lead of 96.

On the referendum of the prohibition amendment the vote on the face of the returns showed 500 or 600 majority against the amendment. A recount was asked and is now going on under the direction of one of the State judges. The above shows that the wet majority has been wiped out and the probabilities now are that a dry majority will finally be returned.

The expense thereof shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

COST OF PRODUCTION OF WHEAT IN KANSAS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have here a statement as to the cost of the production of wheat in the State of Kansas for the year 1919. I should like to have it printed as a document, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with that view.

The motion was agreed to.

FARM-LOAN BANKS.

Mr. McLEAN. If the morning business is closed, I wish to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3897) to amend sections 16 and 26 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act. The bill simply provides a method by which the joint-stock land banks may go into voluntary liquidation.

As many Senators know, when the suit was brought which attacked the act creating the Federal Farm Loan System, it suspended the operations of the joint-stock land banks, and those of them that had not reached a paying basis when the suit was brought want to go out of business. It seems to me that inasmuch as the Government invited them into this field Congress ought to provide some way by which they can go out without material loss.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection at all to any of the joint-stock land banks going out of business; all of them ought to go out; but I have not had a chance to read the bill to which the Senator refers. If it simply allows the dissolution of joint-stock land banks, I have not any objection to it at all, and it ought to pass.

Mr. McLEAN. That is all it does. It proposes to retain the first section of the act as presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. The bill is approved by the Banking and Currency Committee and is unanimously favored by the Federal Farm Loan Board. It is also desired by the joint-stock land banks themselves. I hope there will be no opposition to immediate action upon the measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the Senator ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. McLEAN. I make that request.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, with an amendment to strike out all beginning with section 2, page 2, line 21, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That section 26 of said act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 26. That every Federal land bank and every national farm-loan association, including the capital and reserve or surplus therein and the income derived therefrom, shall be exempt from Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation except taxes upon real estate held, purchased, or taken by said bank or association under the provisions of section 11 and section 13 of this act. First mortgages executed to Federal land banks and farm-loan bonds issued by Federal land banks, under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed and held to be instrumentalities of the Government of the United States, and as such they and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation.

"Shares in any joint-stock land bank may be included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the State within which the bank is located, and such assessment and taxation shall be in manner and subject to conditions and limitations contained in section 5219 of the Revised Statutes with reference to the shares of national banking associations.

"This amendment shall not apply to any farm-loan bond issued by any joint-stock land bank, or farm mortgage taken by such joint-stock land bank, prior to the taking effect of this act. Such bonds and mortgages and the income derived therefrom shall continue to be exempt from Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation: Provided, That as to any joint-stock land bank duly organized and doing business under this act, prior to January 1, 1920, and farm-loan bonds issued by any such joint-stock land bank, this amendment to section 26 shall not become operative until such joint-stock land bank shall have issued farm-loan bonds in amount equal to fifteen times the amount of the paid-up capital stock of such bank on January 1, 1920.

"Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of Federal land banks and national farm-loan associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes, to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 16 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act."

UNFAIR FOREIGN COMPETITION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? There being none, it is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10918) to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to take up House bill 10918.

R. 10918) to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That when used in this act—

The word "person" shall include individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations.

The term "purchase price" shall mean the price or amount paid or to be paid for purchased merchandise as packed ready for shipment to the United States.

The term "selling price" shall mean the price or amount paid or to be paid by the person to whom imported merchandise obtained otherwise than by purchase shall be sold in the United States, not including duties, commissions, or any expenses subsequent to shipment of the merchandise to the United States.

The term "purchased merchandise" shall apply to imported merchandise, dutiable or free, when the price or amount to be paid therefor by a person in the United States to a person in a foreign country or to his agent or representative in the United States has been fixed or agreed upon at the time of or prior to the exportation of the merchandise, whether the merchandise is shipped directly to the purchaser, or to an agent of the seller, or to the seller's branch house in the United States for delivery.

The phrase "otherwise than by purchase" shall apply to imported merchandise, dutiable or free, shipped from a foreign country to the United States without a price or consideration paid or to be paid by a person in the United States to a person in a foreign country, or to his agent or representative in the United States, having been fixed or agreed upon at the time of or prior to the exportation of the merchandise.

The term "United States" shall mean the United States and any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, except the Philippine Islands, the islands of Guam and Tutuila, the Virgin Islands, and the Isthmian Canal Zone.

SEC. 2. That whenever the purchase price of imported merchandise, dutiable or free, of a kind or class made or produced in the United States shall be less than the actual market value thereof, as defined in section 3 of an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913; or, if there be no such actual market value, whenever the purchase price of said merchandise shall be less than the price at the time of exportation for which such merchandise shall be sold for exportation to a country other than the United States; or in case there is neither said actual market value nor said price for exportation; or in case said value or price can not be ascertained to the satisfaction of the appraising officer, whenever the purchase price of said merchandise shall be less than the cost of production, as prescribed in paragraph L of section 3 of said act of October 3, 1913, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties, if any, otherwise provided by law on such imported merchandise a special or dumping duty in the amount of the difference between the purchase price and said actual market value, or between the purchase price and said price for exportation to a country other than the United States, or between the purchase price and said cost of production, as the case may be: Provided That such special or dumping duty shall not apply to any advance in said actual market value or in said price for exportation, as the case may be, between the time of purchase and the time of exportation of the merchandise.

SEC. 3. That whenever the selling price of imported merchandise, dutiable or free, of a kind or class made or produced in the United States shall be less than the actual market value as defined in said section of said act of October 3, 1913, or if there be no such actual market value, whenever the selling price of said merchandise shall be less than the price at the time of exportation for which such merchandise shall be sold for exportation to a country other than the United States, or in case there is neither said actual market value nor said price for exportation, or said value or price can not be ascertained to the satisfaction of the appraising officer, whenever the selling price of said merchandise shall be less than the cost of production, as prescribed in paragraph L of section 3 of said act of October 3, 1913, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties, if any, otherwise provided by law on such imported merchandise, a special or dumping duty in the amount of the difference between the selling price and said actual market value, or between the selling price and said price for exportation to a country other than the United States, or between the selling price and said cost of production, as the case may be.

SEC. 4. That if any person selling, shipping, consigning, or manufacturing merchandise exported to the United States shall fail or refuse to submit to the inspection of a duly accredited investigating officer of the United States, when so requested to do, any or all of his books, records, or accounts pertaining to the value or classification of such merchandise, then the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby empowered and directed, while such failure or refusal continues, to refuse entry into the United States of any goods, wares, or merchandise sold, shipped, consigned, or manufactured by such person.

SEC. 5. That any person who shall, by rebate or concession, or by any other means, directly or indirectly, effect a reduction or diminution of the purchase price or of the selling price, whereby the purchase price or the selling price of imported merchandise, dutiable or free, covered by this act shall be less than the actual market value, or the price for exportation, or the cost of production, as the case may be; and any person importing said merchandise, or to whom said merchandise shall be consigned, who shall fail or refuse to submit to the inspection of a duly accredited investigating officer of the United States, when so requested to do, any or all of his books, records, or accounts pertaining to said merchandise, shall upon conviction be fined for each offense a sum not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for a time not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to appear at the end of the bill which is now being considered. I ask to have it read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed, as follows:

Add at end of proposed amendment of the committee the following:

"That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in respect of the excess over the sum of $1,000 which any person, firm, association, or corporation shall give, advance, pay, expend, subscribe, or contribute in the aggregate during any taxable year for the purpose, directly or indirectly, of influencing the nomination or defeat of any candidate or candidates for nomination, or the election or defeat of any candidate or candidates for office, or the success or defeat of any proposition to be voted upon at any primary election or general or special election at which candidates for Members of the House of Representatives or for United States Senator or presidential electors are to be nominated or elected, a tax equal to 100 per cent of such excess, such expenditures or contributions to include all sums in any form contributed, subscribed, advanced, expended, paid, or given to or for or against such candidate, candidates, or proposition or to or for party or other political committees or campaign funds, but not to include lawful expenditures made by such candidates or regular political committees or out of such campaign funds of moneys lawfully contributed to them.

"Every person, firm, and corporation required by law to make an income-tax return shall state therein specifically each item and the date thereof of all gifts, advances, expenditures, subscriptions, payments, and contributions made, and to whom, for the purpose of influencing the result of such primary and general elections and of all taxes due thereon under the provisions of this section. And the treasurer or chairman of all State or congressional committees and of all political committees as defined in the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' and of all associations or committees organized to promote or prevent or engaged in promoting or preventing the nomination or election of any candidate for Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate of the Congress of the United States or for presidential elector or electors, shall within 30 days after the election to be held therefor file with the collector for the district where the headquarters or other office where such committee or association is located, a return stating specifically all sums of money received, from whom received, and the date thereof."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that during the day I shall offer an amendment to the pending bill. I did not know that this measure was to be called up this morning or I should have prepared an amendment expressing definitely the point in mind; but, in substance, it will provide that the dumping duty provided for in the pending bill shall not be imposed in any case unless the collector of customs for the port at which such imported merchandise is dutiable shall first find and determine from the evidence before him that the production, manufacture, sale, or distribution of such commodity within the United States is not controlled by any corporation, association, combination, trust, or conspiracy to create a monopoly in such commodity, and that such commodity is not sold in the markets of the United States at an unfair or unreasonable price, and the burden of proof to establish the foregoing shall be upon the importer, and unless the importer shall establish the same said dumping duty shall not be imposed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Republican Party, which by a strict party vote, or nearly so, has forced this bill on for consideration, is entitled to the thanks of the country for having on the eve of an election shown that while the hand is still that of Esau the voice is nevertheless the voice of Jacob.

The one thing that for years has characterized the Republican Party is its tender solicitude for big money. It still adheres to the philosophy that if you take care of big money big money will take care of the people.

We have in the United States at the present time a condition where the consumer is being plucked and robbed to a degree that requires no description by me, for the effect of that plundering is felt in every household of the land. Undoubtedly the condition is largely the result of an actual dearth of production; but growing out of that primal cause is a speculation that begins with the original producer and ends only when the product is turned over to the ultimate consumer. Enormous profits are being realized not only by the manufacturer but by every middleman of the United States. These profits can be in part measured by the huge excess-profits taxes collected by this Government, and I have no doubt that a very large percentage of excess-profits taxes that are due are never in fact returned or collected. The profits can be measured also in the rough by the advertising in the great dailies and periodicals of the country. The testimony which the Committee on Manufactures has been taking discloses the fact that these advertisements are now so excessive that they have resulted in the increase in the size of publications to a point where the print paper of this country has been exhausted and newspapers of the smaller kind are being forced out of business because they are compelled to pay as high as 16 cents a pound for white paper that a few years ago brought 2 cents or 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. In this connection I suppose the Senator noticed in the morning press the statement that the price is to be advanced again on the 1st of July.

Mr. REED. Newspaper proprietors tell the committee that advertisements are offered to them, perfectly legitimate in their character, in such quantities that they can not print them. These advertisements are being rejected daily in order to circumscribe to some extent the consumption of white paper. This influx of advertising has grown up chiefly since the war, and it has increased notwithstanding a steady and, in many instances, a radical advance in advertising rates. The reason given is that trade is brisk, prices are high, profits are large, and therefore advertising goes on in increasing ratio.

All this I am citing—and I might hold the floor for hours bringing forward similar evidence—to show that to-day, without using the ugly term of "profiteering," profits are being made that are excessively large. It is possible to charge the prices which realize those profits because there is an actual gap between production and consumption. There are not enough goods here to supply the market, and there will be no real relief until the goods are supplied.

Mr. President, at a time like this, with these conditions confronting us, the Republican Party by a party vote forces for consideration a bill the purpose of which is to prevent the fall of prices!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. A bill passed Congress just the other day allowing paper to come into the United States free of duty up to 8 cents a pound instead of 5.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator would not charge the Republican Party with being guilty of allowing that 8-cent paper to come in with a view to increasing its price?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President. While that is aside from what I am talking about and is a detail, I will take it up and dispose of it in a few words.

Under the tremendous pressure of the newspapers that were being starved to death, a bill was passed permitting paper to come into the United States free of duty up to the value of 8 cents a pound; but the statement was made at the time that the only effect of the bill was to let in the paper which had previously come in free, that the price had gone up on paper to above 5 cents, and that the result of the tariff duty was to keep out paper which formerly had come in free. But the bill did not go far enough. The bill ought to have admitted all paper free of duty, of whatsoever price, because all paper, except some of the very highest classes used for only limited purposes, is made out of the same raw material substantially as newsprint paper, and if we would let all of it come in we would be better able to supply the demand which is now made for newsprint paper.

What has that to do with this case? This bill applies to everything. We have to-day a shortage of shoes. Men are paying $18 and $20 for shoes who used to get the same shoes made in the same factories for from $5 to $7. We have a shortage of clothing. Men are paying $100 to $150 for a tailor-made suit who used to pay $50 and $65 for the same suit. What I have said of these two items applies everywhere.

Under such conditions what could be better for the American people than to have that sort of a market speedily broken up? What would tend more to break it up than to have the goods of foreign countries brought here and sold so that these enormous prices could no longer be extorted from our people?

In order to take care of the manufacturers of the United States, who have been making profits beyond the dreams of Crœsus, you propose to shut the American citizen off from the only possible source of supply that will enable him to get decent prices. It is the old story of the Republican Party still bowing at the shrine of Mammon and still willing to rob the consumers of the United States for the benefit of a few overrich producers.

That is all I want to say this morning. I shall have something to say later on.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I filed what is called the minority report on this bill, and, while it bears my signature and none other, I am authorized to state that it expresses the views of several of the minority members of the Finance Committee. Hence, while it is ostensibly the objection of a single member, it is actually that of several others.

I endeavored in that report to outline as concisely as possible what seemed to be the chief objectionable features of this proposal. Briefly stated, the object of the bill is to prevent the importation into the United States of goods which seemingly command a price below that which is asked or which can be obtained for the same goods in the country of exportation; and it is designed, therefore, as stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], to protect American manufacturers from foreign competition, upon the theory that the practice known as dumping is a species of unfair competition which may result in injury of a very serious nature to our domestic production.

It is ostensibly prompted by the enactment of a similar measure in Canada and aimed principally at manufacturers in the United States. The very fact, however, that Canada has seen fit to enact such legislation indicates that the American manufacturers have been doing to Canada, or propose to do to Canada, the very thing which the bill is designed to prevent as regards Canada and other competitive nations; and that, of course, must assume that we have been practicing, or are practicing, unfair competition against other nations, thereby provoking retaliatory legislation, of which this is a part.

But, Mr. President, I am inclined to the belief that this is one of a series of pending measures of an economic character that is designed to fasten ultimate and complete prohibition against the possibility of competition with American production.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think, in justice to those who are listening to the Senator, he ought to say that it affects no importations if the goods are sold to American merchants or importers at the same price at which similar goods are sold in any other country. It affects only those goods which are sold in this country at a lower price than that at which they are sold in other countries. In other words, I know the Senator is well aware of the practice which Germany has exercised in the past——

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and I am also well aware of the practices we have exercised against Germany in the past.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of this particular bill now.

Mr. THOMAS. So am I.

Mr. SMOOT. Wherever the goods have been sold, Mr. President, at a less price than that at which they are sold in other countries, it is generally for the purpose of unloading a surplus amount which they may have on hand at less than cost, or else to destroy an American industry, and that has generally been the case in the past. I could stand here all day and cite cases where Germany has destroyed American industries through just that very same practice.

Mr. THOMAS. I know what is the ostensible basis of the bill, and it has just been very clearly stated by the Senator from Utah. But in the administration of this bill every manufacturer or seller of American goods, apprehensive of foreign competition, will invoke and seek to apply the inhibitory clauses of the bill to all importations of goods of a similar character, thus causing an investigation, and pending the investigation; which, of course, involves a hearing, the importer, notwithstanding he does not come within the provisions of the bill at all, may be very seriously crippled, perhaps ruined, as a result of the investigation, because goods are purchased, either from domestic or from foreign manufacturers, for but one purpose, and that is for resale, and generally speaking for rapid resale.

It is the utilization of an apprehension for the purpose of placing a conditional embargo upon foreign importations, both as to their purchase and as to their sale, and both of which incidents can be invoked against the same line of goods or the same importations.

That is bad enough; but the serious and far-reaching objection to the measure is that, under the guise of preventing injury to American manufacturers, it abolishes the free list, or tends in that direction; and if that be true, then the bill should be rejected without regard to the existence of any danger which it seeks to obviate.

Now, let us see. I call attention to sections 2 and 3 of the bill, the first relating to the purchase price, the second to the selling price. Section 2 provides—

That whenever the purchase price of imported merchandise dutiable or free of a kind or class made or produced in the United States shall be less than the actual market value thereof as defined in section 3 of an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913.

Section 3 uses the same language, reading:

That whenever the selling price of imported merchandise dutiable or free of a kind or class made or produced in the United States shall be less than the actual market value as defined in said section of said act of October 3, 1913.

Goods which have been exempted from the operation of every tariff law that Congress ever enacted, goods which have sometimes appeared upon, sometimes have been absent from, the free list, goods which the trade experiences of this country have demonstrated should remain upon the free list, become subject to the embargo proposed by the bill the instant any American manufacturer or rival dealer desires to place obstacles in the way of imported goods of the same character. The procedure through which the administration of the bill is effected provides that—

There shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties, if any, otherwise provided by law on such imported merchandise, a special or dumping duty in the amount of the difference between the purchase price and said actual market value, or between the purchase price and said price for exportation to a country other than the United States—

And so forth. And in the other section that—there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties, if any, otherwise provided by law on such imported merchandise, a special or dumping duty in the amount of the difference between the selling price and said actual market value.

The law is drawn, in other words, upon the principle that the old darkey set his coon trap, to "ketch 'em comin' an' gwine." John Smith imports a line of goods either dutiable or free. His competitor here says that the purchase price is less than the purchase price of the same goods at the orignal home market, but he may also say that the selling price is less than the selling price here or the selling price in the country of exportation, and he may well ask, therefore, that the duty which is levied as a penalty upon the purchase and the duty which is levied as a penalty upon the selling shall both be collected from the unfortunate individual who has the temerity to import goods into this country for the very legitimate purpose of making a profit in his business.

Mr. President, we are going mad, it seems to me, in our proposed legislation consequent upon the war, as we did in our legislation during the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator in referring to section 2 of the bill, which relates to the country where the goods are purchased, knows that that is the purchase price of imported merchandise, while section 3 has reference to the selling price of imported merchandise.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and my contention is that both sections can be applied to the same importation.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator so stated. Section 3 applies to agents of importers, goods being shipped from a foreign country to an agent in New York or any other place in the United States. The goods are not sold to them at all. The goods belong to the foreign manufacturer, and they are only held here by the agent for the sale in the United States and following importation. This provision simply means that where they are imported direct the law shall apply, or where the agent in the United States sells the goods that have been sent him as agent of the foreign manufacturer, then it shall apply. It is impossible to have both sections apply to the one sale of goods.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied that that is the Senator's construction of the bill, and I am satisfied that unless that were his construction he would not have reported it favorably.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course not.

Mr. THOMAS. So I am not in any way attempting to criticize the position which the Senator occupies and has occupied regarding the bill, but I have known of a great many statutes in my time which have been enacted with a clear purpose and object in view in the administration of which great disappointments have resulted.

I was referring, when interrupted, to the tendency to enact ill-advised and ill-considered legislation in this postwar period, and in the absence very largely of adequate and satisfactory information. You will recall, sir, that during the war every bill of any consequence introduced in Congress recited in its preamble or somewhere in the body of the bill that its purpose was the more effectual and vigorous prosecution of the war.

Now, these bills of an economic character are designed upon their face, or in the discussions accompanying and following their consideration in committee, on the ground that they are necessary for safeguarding American industry against the inevitable and immediate consequences of the termination of the war.

Mr. President, the country has been flooded with literature and with assurances of other sorts of the accumulation in other great manufacturing countries of enormous quantities of merchandise designed for the American market, about to be imported, and which upon arrival will be sold at ruinous competitive prices. It is that bugaboo, that element of the distorted imagination, which lies at the basis of this bill and of the dye bill and of every one of the so-called popgun tariff bills that have been passed by the House and sent over here for consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator I should like to inquire if the pending bill was submitted to the Tariff Commission for its views and recommendation?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, it was; and I have here, if the Senator desires to see it, a copy of their report.

Mr. REED. On the bill as now amended?

Mr. THOMAS. Upon the bill, not upon the bill as now amended. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the Tariff Commission is virtually the author of the measure; that is, they drew the provisions of the bill as amended, at my request.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; they drew the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say that the Tariff Commission suggested that this legislation should be passed.

Mr. THOMAS. No; they did not do that.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to be misunderstood. They did not do that. I understood the Senator from Missouri to ask whether their attention had been called to the bill.

I wish to say to the Senator that at my request the bill was drawn by the Tariff Commission—that is, with the exception of a few amendments that were offered to it in committee by myself before reporting it to the Senate—but the principle of the bill and the substance of it were the result of a request made by me of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. REED. What I want to ascertain is whether the Tariff Commission sponsors this legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; it is not permitted under the law to sponsor any legislation.

Mr. REED. Does it recommend it?

Mr. THOMAS. It is not permitted to recommend any, and has not recommended this measure. It made a report, at the request of the House committee, and that report I have just handed to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator, and I will examine the report.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I venture the assertion, without any hesitation, that there is no surplus stock of manufactured goods anywhere in the world outside of the United States. The manufacturing countries of the world are the United States, Canada, Japan, England, France, Italy, Germany, Belgium, and probably some others. It is those nations which furnish the 1,600,000,000 human beings in the world with the manufactured necessities of life, and in every one of them the war has not only dislocated but resulted in a practical suspension of their ordinary and essential functions. This was inevitable. The machinery engaged in the manufacture of merchandise for the world in those countries, every one of which was involved in the war, was for the most part mobilized and converted into the production of munition supplies. That is true of all of them—textile manufacturers, metal manufacturers, chemical manufacturers, and production of all sorts. Even the products of the mines were diverted from their legitimate channels to those of war, and at the same time some 20,000,000 producers, the young men of all those nations, were either entirely withdrawn from the avenues of production and placed in the ranks or else they were mobilized also for the necessary production of war material of all sorts.

Moreover, the obtaining of raw materials for manufacture for commercial purposes outside of the United States was almost completely suspended, and here, after we entered the war, they were diverted for the most part into military channels. To contend, therefore, that England or France or Germany or Japan, which is a new specter upon the protectionists' horizon, is so encumbered with the good things of the world as to induce the owners of this merchandise to seek the great American market would be a hallucination, if it were not a deliberate conspiracy. What greater boon to-day could befall the people of the United States than the importation to it of millions upon millions of dollars' worth of clothing, of foodstuffs, and of all the other items that go to make up modern civilized life? What a terrible calamity it would be to the people of the United States, in other words, if foreign competition resulted in a reduction of prices to the consumers in America!

Instead of prohibiting it we should welcome it with outstretched arms, and thereby mitigate to some degree the conditions to which the Senator from Missouri has just directed the attention of the Senate. Of course, I would not, any more than any other American, care to see such a situation prolonged to the extent of menacing the existence of American industries, but these are able to take care of themselves, their statements to the contrary notwithstanding.

The business of dumping is not peculiar to Germany. During the discussions in the Senate of the provisions of the Payne-Aldrich bill, and upon the floor of the House as well, the attention of the country was called time after time to the sale in foreign markets of American goods at percentages and prices enormously below those which were required to be paid by American consumers.

Mr. REED. And it was defended on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; defended as an economic necessity, and due, of course, to the production of more goods than the domestic market could consume.

I recall, Mr. President, reading during those days of the importation from Europe to America of a line of cheap watches which the importers were able to sell to the American consumer, after paying freight twice across the Atlantic, for less than a similar article manufactured by the same institution could be secured for here. I do not defend that practice; I never did; but I am unable, Mr. President, to see wherein practices which we doubtless taught our competitors, and which certainly did exist in certain lines of industry, notably in the dye industry, and by the connivance of the textile manufacturers of the United States, should be used at this time as an argument for legislation, based, as I say, upon conditions of which we know practically nothing beyond the fact that the menace which lies at the basis of it is much more imaginary than real.

Now, Mr. President, when you take this antidumping bill, and consider also the embargo features of the dye bill—both of which are unique pieces of protective legislation, both of which are prohibitory in their character, under neither of which can the Government of the United States obtain any revenue, but which in their operation will continue war prohibitive conditions—we are driven to one conclusion, namely, that the manufacturers of the United States have discovered, through their enjoyment of absolute prohibition under war conditions a most unique method, through legislation, of continuing those conditions in times of peace; and by substituting licenses and antidumping features, which are but the entry of the head of the camel into the protection tent, those methods of so-called protection will ultimately become substitutes for tariff duties.

Why not? If importations can be stopped at the port of reception, or if before they are permitted to cross the sea a license must be secured from some bureau down here in Washington, or, what is better, if permission must be obtained from an embargo commissioner, what is the use of a system of protective tariffs? Why not do away with tariffs? They do not bring much to the Government, anyway, when they are too high; their administration is complicated and sometimes difficult, sometimes ineffectual. Constant legislation is had either to reduce or to expand them. They never have been permanently established.

If our Republican friends carry the next election, they will not "do a thing" to the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill. They are whetting their chops now over the anticipatory blessings that are to come from a change of administration. They are already proposing, in addition to these special features of protection, a line of duties for so-called war industries that will make poor old Aldrich turn over in his grave if he hears of them; and all upon the phantom apprehension that the competitive manufacturing nations of the world, with untold millions of dollars' worth of goods piled up upon the wharves of the ports of Europe, will invade the markets of the United States and accomplish what the military power of Germany failed to do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. REED. And if the Senator from Colorado will permit a suggestion, at the very time that they are telling us that these vast quantities of goods are piled up and ready to be dumped in America, they are telling us that Europe is starving to death and freezing to death, and that the people of the Old World have neither clothing nor shoes nor food; and yet they would have us believe that there are vast quantities of merchandise there unconsumed and ready to be shipped to this country and sold at ridiculously low prices.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is a most apt one. One or the other of these positions can not be correct, for otherwise the manufacturers of Europe are far more heartless than our manufacturers were ever charged with being, because they are permitting their own people to suffer for the necessities of life in order that they may flood the American markets with their goods.

Mr. REED. And sell them cheaply.

Mr. THOMAS. And sell them cheaply, so cheaply, indeed, that the great monopolies of America will be ruined if those goods are permitted to come.

Oh, Mr. President, I have the highest respect for my associates upon the committee; I have no intention, even indirectly, of impeaching their sincerity in the consideration and support of this and kindred measures. I can only account for their state of mind, however, by assuming that they have blindly accepted the representations which have been made by the beneficiaries of these proposed measures and would hasten legislation before this session of Congress adjourns lest panic and ruin and bankruptcy overwhelm the country between now and the occurrence of the next Presidential election.

The report of the Tariff Commission is confined principally to a discussion of the operations of the Canadian measure, which is both condemned and approved by Canadians interested in its operation. It is said that other countries have also enacted antidumping legislation, but the only other instance which is discussed in the report of the commission is that of Australia. I am in receipt of a copy of a telegram, dated the 24th day of April last, regarding the proposed Balfour dumping bill in Great Britain, which I will read:

> According to a cable from United States Commercial Attaché Hutchinson at London, made public to-day by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the Balfour bill, designed to protect the tea industry and prevent dumping, has been rejected on second reading by a majority of 1.

Great Britain was in the war much longer than we, but she seems to be recovering her commercial equilibrum much more rapidly than is the United States. Doubtless her commercial agencies have long ago satisfied themselves that the evils sought to be remedied by this sort of legislation were more imaginary than actual. Whatever the reason may be, however, I can not but believe that the action of the British House of Commons upon this subejct is wise and will prove to be so by the passage of events.

I had occasion yesterday in discussing the bill relating to the dyestuffs industry, which claims to need an embargo in order to protect it against German dye competition, to direct attention to the economic condition of the German people and also to the economic features of the treaty in order to establish my contention that competition from German sources in the dye industry for the next few years is an economic and physical impossibility. I then pointed out also that the amount of German dyes on hand was not only insufficient to meet the demands, but that, because of that fact, England and France had both repealed their embargoes against German dyestuffs and were anxious to get them.

One has but to read in the magazines and in the dispatches day after day what the economic and political conditions of Germany are to form a perfectly sane and, I think, sound opinion regarding the condition of that unhappy people. The Saturday Evening Post, which I bought this morning, contains an article upon the subject from the pen of Will Irwin, who I do not think can be accused of any bias toward Germany, who represents this paper in Europe, and who says, among other things, in an article from his pen which appears in that magazine:

> The general statements heard all last winter to the effect that Germany was working while the rest of us struck and loafed, that she was piling up goods to flood our markets, circulate no longer. The allied council has somewhat tardily realized that Germany can never pay the bill unless she is granted raw materials and fed.

I might pause here to emphasize the fact that the textile manufacturers in Germany are without raw materials. She was our third best customer for them before the war. My recollection is that our annual exports of cotton to Germany prior to 1914 were about $150,000,000. She has not the credit nor the goods to exchange for that cotton to-day. If she had, I should like the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to consider what a calamity it would be to the cotton producers of Dixie if they were compelled to accept German goods in exchange for cotton at 50 cents a pound. But she has them not. Neither has she the money, for the character of money now in Germany is also mentioned by this author:

The allied council has somewhat tardily realized that Germany can never pay the bill unless she is granted raw materials and fed; and the allied council is educating the public in order to get opinion back of certain measures that will be resisted by private interests. But from the American newspapers I cull here and there one kind of general statement which gives a most untrue picture of German life and conditions to-day. It has to do with prices in Berlin. For example, an American manufacturer, back from a flying trip, announced to the reporters that living was cheap in Berlin; he had bought there an excellent pair of shoes for $4, which couldn't be done at home. I have seen other paragraphs to the same effect. And it might be just as well to set forth here what $4 American means to the average German.

The mark is at present worth about a cent—sometimes a few mills more, sometimes a few mills less. It used to be worth a quarter. And the only fair test of living conditions is what a mark is worth to a German.

From the point of view of one who has an American income the situation is a kind of nightmare comedy, best illustrated by the present happy situation of our Army of the Rhine about Coblenz. The humblest American doughboy gets $33 a month, with free board, lodging, clothes, and medical attendance. Reenlisted men, noncommissioned officers, and those who perform special services on the side get more. Probably the average soldier in the army of occupation gets somewhat more than $40 a month over and above the necessities of life. In February the paymaster's department set the official rate of exchange at 100 marks to the dollar. An income of $40 a month became 4,000 marks a month. Let us say for the sake of easy calculation that the average pay of the enlisted men and "noncoms" is 50,000 marks a year—which is not far from the fact. Probably no salaried German in our zone of occupation gets as much. The highest salary of a German official in that region is, I believe, only 12,000 marks a year.

Fifty thousand marks a year is the interest, at the conservative rate of 5 per cent, on 1,000,000 marks—and our doughboy has food, clothes, and lodgings thrown in. By this calculation we may behold the Ameroc force as it appears to the natives of Coblenz—an army of millionaires! And so they deport themselves. In such a situation as now confronts Germany the rise in prices always lingers far behind the fall in the exchange value of money. For a long time the price of diamonds in and about Coblenz was about $100 a carat. Doughboy report has it—with what truth I know not—that the New York price is about $500 a carat. Whereupon they all saved or borrowed, and invested in diamonds. When they bought rings for themselves they wore them. When they bought rings for the girls at home they wore them also—on their little fingers. Nowadays as the drill sergeant commands "Carry arms!" a blinding glitter runs along the line.

Translating commodities back into American terms, a good razor costs 30 cents; a string of real amber beads for your girl, one to two dollars; a walking stick, from 10 cents to $1; a bottle of champagne, 40 cents.

That last item arouses recollections of the most pleasing and delightful character.

As a result of strikes and favoring Government measures workingmen's wages have been steadily advanced since the armistice. A common laborer now gets 2 marks an hour, a skilled mechanic 3½ marks or sometimes 4. The 44-hour week is now universal. Therefore the laborer, if he has steady employment, earns 88 marks a week; the skilled workman, 154 to 176 marks a week. To get American values calculate the mark as a cent.

As I have explained in the previous article, all food except game and poultry is theoretically rationed in Germany—and only theoretically. The people will not abide by the Government system of rationing, which is below the starvation line, anyway, and the Government has not the machinery of enforcement.

* * * * * * *

To get our basis of comparison, then, let us take a common laborer with steady work. He earns at most 88 marks a week. Ignoring his necessary expense for Government-rationed bread, for rent, for fuel, for transportation if he lives far from his work, his week's pay will get 1 pound of butter at 35 marks, 1 pound of sugar at 16 marks, 2 pounds of beef at 12 marks a pound, and 6 eggs. Read the current prices in your morning newspaper, figure the total cost in current American money of a pound of butter, a pound of sugar, 2 pounds of beef and 6 eggs, and you find what a laborer's weekly salary means in Berlin.

* * * * * * *

"Speaking economically," said a German, "our middle class at this moment is tending to disappear. Part, through speculation and graft, are rising into the economic upper class; most of the rest are fading back into the economic lower class." For a great part of the middle class, lacking the weapon of the strike, is in bad straits. Stenographers, for example, get now 400 to 600 marks a month. The lowest of these salaries is a few marks a month better than the earnings of the common laborer; the highest, lower than that of the skilled mechanic.

Of course, Mr. President, payment of a workman in marks as compared with the payment of a workman in dollars gives an apparent great advantage to the former; but when you consider that it is impossible for him, owing to the difference in exchange, to earn a decent livelihood except for Government help, and that Government help is possible only through an enormous swelling of the national debt, which not only increases the necessary annual expenditures of the Government but also tends ultimately to make that burden absolutely unbearable should the debt ever be redeemed, or should the attempt be made to redeem it, in gold, the effect upon the industrial morale of the people can be well imagined; and when to that you add the further reflection that practically every dollar of profit made by these institutions must go to pay the allied indemnities, the total amount of which will not be fixed until the 1st day of May, 1921, how is it possible for the manufacturer or the laborer or any other subject of the Empire to continue to possess those elements of enterprise, that selfish enlightenment, which prompt men to work for gain?

If every dollar made by the people of the South had been taken from them by the Government of the United States as a penalty for their throwing the country into civil war in 1861, or, to be more precise, if such a penalty had been imposed upon the southern people as a part of the reconstruction scheme, the South to-day would be as poor and as desolate as it was when Lee surrendered his army at Appomattox, for production rests upon the ambition of the individual. In its last analysis it means the desire of that individual to improve his condition; and if such improvement is impossible, regardless of his efforts to that end, there is no incentive for his exerting himself at all. Hence the lack of what might be called industrial morale from one end of the former Empire of Germany to the other.

I think I have read enough from this article to indicate its general tenor. Senators who desire to pursue it further will find it one of the most interesting contributions to the subject that have so far appeared in print in America. So the bugaboo of dumpage, when applied to Germany, has not even the substantive proportions of a nightmare.

Now, let us take France. The war rested more heavily upon France than any other nation engaged in it, certainly any other western nation, Belgium not excepted. The French occupied territory was denuded of everything of a material character that the Germans could carry off or destroy. They did not content themselves with that, for they forcibly deported a great percentage of the population. They flooded the mines, thereby demonstrating that the German war of 1914 was a war of commercial as well as of political conquest. The French people—men, women, and children—were enlisted for the war, and production was necessarily limited to the barest necessities of life. The exports from France since the war have been practically negligible. The great disproportion between her exports and her imports has presented to her people perhaps the most serious financial problem that has so far arisen from the war. In southern France there is an excess of wines and liquors. They can not very well be dumped upon the shores of the United States, nor, even if the provisions of the Volstead law were modified to the extent demanded from some sources, could they come here. Her silks, if she had any, would find competition in the mills of America, which are able to-day to manufacture a better quality at a lower price. It certainly can not be contended, therefore, that we are confronted with the danger of dumpage from France.

Italy was not so badly treated; but Italy's unfortunate lack of coal and of raw materials has so badly crippled her productive activities that she is to-day upon the very border of national bolshevism. Only a day or two ago it was announced that the Italian Government proposed to put an inhibition upon the use of gasoline in passenger automobiles because of the lack of gasoline for actually necessary purposes in that Kingdom. There is no danger of dumping from there.

Belgium is doing better than any of the other allies in the war. She has had fewer labor disturbances. She has rallied to the new conditions of the nation more universally than any other people suffering from the war. Her manufactories are showing signs of productive activity and her coal mines are working full blast. But, Mr. President, Belgium was never a serious competitor with America except in glass and one or two other commodities.

In 1913, when the Finance Committee had the Underwood bill under consideration, the glass manufacturers of the United States insisted that a reduction of the duties they were then enjoying would put them out of business; and on paper they came very near proving it. Their competitor was Belgium, where enormous quantities of glass were made with cheap labor, and whose expansion would in all probability overwhelm the American market under a low rate of duty. Congress passed the measure, however, without change, and it is a singular fact that very soon afterwards the glass manufacturers of the United States began to pay dividends. No tariff was ever yet reduced, and certainly no tariff was ever lowered, without confronting the assurance that it meant grave injury and possible destruction to the business.

England, the greatest manufacturer of all, is exporting some goods. She is exporting a great many articles of merchandise to the United States. She is restoring her lines of international traffic, and supplying some of her old customers with much-needed articles. But, Mr. President, any excess of imports from Great Britain to this country is due to our very impolitic treatment of the dye situation, and results in the importation into America of vast quantities of shirtings, dyed with German dyes, and which the American market for shirtings inexorably demands, tariff or no tariff. They are not sending them here at low prices. I ordered a couple of shirts a few days ago. Two shirts in these days is about all a man of ordinary income can afford, one to wear while the other is in the wash. I ordered two very cheap shirts, and by cheap shirts I mean shirts which at prevailing prices were of ordinary character. They will cost me $6.50 apiece. I am inclined to think, from the looks of the material, that they will be made of imported shirtings, carrying German dyes in all probability. That sort of dumping does not make me feel very comfortable, if it is dumping.

Mr. President, the proponents of this bill, in my judgment, will be unable to specify the importation in quantity of goods from any other country since the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had time, I would specify to the Senator; and if he does not object—and I do not think he will, as 2 o'clock is nearly here—I wish to say that if it were not for what I will call the danger—because I consider it danger—of the importation of aeroplanes from England at this particular time, which, to my mind, would unquestionably close the concerns manufacturing aeroplanes in this country, there would be no particular necessity for the immediate passage of this antidumping bill. I think the Senator was in the Chamber when I called it up a few days ago and made that statement.

Mr. THOMAS. No; I was in New York on that occasion. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not a fact that this aeroplane situation developed after this bill had reached the Senate and was under consideration?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. The first time I ever heard of it was in connection with this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we knew of that situation before the bill was ever reported to the Senate. The propaganda for the selling of aeroplanes in America developed, however, about the time we were considering this bill in the committee. I would like, of course, to save our manufacture of aeroplanes in the United States, if possible. I recognize that the importation of goods into the United States now is increasing each month. During the month of February of this year there was an increase of 100 per cent as compared with the importation of goods in the same month last year.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator approve of that? Is he not glad of it?

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say, even if the Senator had not asked the question, that I am not objecting to the importation of any goods where they are imported regularly, but we have a case in hand here, and I do not know but that if some action is not taken the manufacture of aeroplanes in this country will cease for a number of years to come.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah if he does not believe that the aeroplane question could be satisfactorily taken care of through a separate bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will say to the Senator that that could be done. I have not any doubt about it at all. But I do not want to have it understood that I am opposed in any way to an antidumping law. I think, Mr. President, if we go into this far enough I can demonstrate beyond the question of a doubt that it is necessary for the future development of our industries in this country, and the industries of the country would have been a great deal better off, and I think the dyestuffs bill never would have been before the Senate of the United States at this time, if we had had a real antidumping law in effect in the years past.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I desire further to ask the Senator if he does not believe that it would be good policy to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to hold hearings, in order that we may ascertain the facts in connection with the manufacture of goods throughout the entire world, so far as they can be obtained, so that when the matter is finally considered by the Senate we will have something concrete upon which to base our conclusions?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's suggestion would be a wise one if we did not know already that the provisions of the bill do not affect the regular channels of trade in any way, shape, or form; I mean the honest channels of trade. When I say the honest channels of trade I expect the Senator immediately to think of the exportation of American goods to foreign countries where they have been sold in the past for less than the prices at which they were sold in this country. But in many of the countries to-day that can not be done, because of the very fact that they have protected themselves through antidumping legislation. I want America to protect itself; and I will say now that with the lack of goods in the world—and I say the world because I think that there is even a lack of them in the United States—if we produce enough of them in the United States competition itself will bring the price down to a reasonable figure. But with that lack of goods I do not think there is very much immediate danger. I take the same position as that taken by the Senator from Colorado, that as long as there is a shortage of goods in the world there is not very much chance of any country undertaking to dump any great quantity or any number of lines of goods in the United States.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Thanking the Senator from Colorado for his courtesy, I send the following amendment to the desk and ask to have it printed. It proposes to amend the pending bill by striking out the title and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

An act to perpetuate existing high prices and to encourage monopoly.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

BENEFICIARIES OF VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask unanmous consent that the Senate take up the bill (H. R. 12266) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended by the act of July 11, 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. It will not lead to any debate?

Mr. KENYON. I think not. I will state that all there is involved in the bill is an amendment to the vocational rehabilitation act for the benefit of soldiers, increasing the amount for the maintenance of a soldier without dependents from $80 to $100 and of a soldier with dependents from $100 to $120.

While I say it increases the amounts, it is optional with the Vocational Board as to whether to allow that much. That is all there is to it. The bill has passed the House unanimously. There are a number of injured soldiers who want to take the vocational training who can not do so because the amounts allowed are not sufficient in certain cases to pay their expenses.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the bill may go over until I may have an opportunity to examine it. I want to be certain, and I suppose the Senator would, of course, like to be certain, that the men may obtain through this Vocational Board enough to properly sustain them in every reasonable way, but not enough above the ordinary payments they would receive through their regular employment if or when well and at work, so that some men might take advantage and, instead of shirking, they might be working with those who are patriotically laboring in production for those who are not to be helped by the Vocational Board. I want men who, when well and able to work, will help in production rather than take advantage of the higher rate of pay accorded by a grateful Government to those who are in real need.

Mr. KENYON. I do not believe it is exactly an eleemosynary institution to help the men who have been disabled in this war to whom we are trying to give some chance in lines of industry which will prepare them to make a living.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will state that the original bill provides that this act can only be extended to those who, on account of their physical injuries, can not pursue their original lines of work.

Mr. WARREN. But, Mr. President, I have been informed, and I wish to look it up a little, that some of the physicians who are getting $3 for each examination they make of these soldiers, and others, are passing them up for aid, examining them and reexamining them, for higher pay, and so forth, without any seeming cause except, perhaps, the $3 the examiner gets. Those, of course, are not true soldiers, and it does not speak well for the profession, but I understand that until we can rid the Government of the employment of at least some of those persons we had better be a little careful how we raise the allowance.

Mr. KENYON. Had we better cease taking care of these soldiers because there may be a few unworthy doctors?

Mr. WARREN. By no means; but there is no reason because of the feeling in this country of gratitude to the soldiers, which you and I intensely feel, why we should entertain a line of some almost deadbeats, who have only in mind the grand old flag provided they can get under it an appropriation or a living without honest endeavor and action.

Mr. KENYON. Let us get rid of those deadbeats.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. KENYON. But do not let the deadbeats affect justice to the soldiers.

Mr. WARREN. No; not by any means. I expect to look up the matter very soon. There are a few matters in connection with the sundry civil appropriation bill which is now in the House under debate, which bill does not bear perhaps directly upon these salaries or allowances, but it does in some particulars bear very forcibly upon the general subject.

Mr. KENYON. I shall call up the bill after a reasonable time.

THE DYE INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 8078.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

VALUE OF COTTON CONTRACTS.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, following my discussions of March 25, 30, April 1, 3, 17, and 29, regarding the operation of the cotton-futures act, pointing particularly to the unreliableness of the exchange values with spot-cotton values and the serious loss which comes to the trade from same and pointing out methods of relief in the form of an amendment to the Smith-Lever amendment to the cotton-futures act as made in March, 1919. To this the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] on April 30 interposed objections and contra reasons, and I will now endeavor to clear up his objections to the passage of the amendment and to show that the amendment to the Smith-Lever amendment of last year will simply help carry out the purpose of the entire act. The original Smith-Lever bill was enacted because of the serious irregularities practiced by the cotton exchanges in contract cotton manipulations and deliveries, which manipulations made within the law resulted in seriously depressing the cotton market and causing great losses to legitimate dealers on the exchange, making legitimate business practically impossible.

It was found that the original Smith-Lever bill did not accomplish the desired results, did not stabilize the value of cotton, and the Smith-Lever amendment of March 18, 1919, was inserted as a rider on the Agricultural bill and passed exactly like the proposed Comer amendment and for the same purpose. In other words, the Comer amendment is offered exactly like the Smith-Lever amendment of last year, and has for its sole design the enabling of the Smith-Lever amendment to accomplish the design of the amendment, which was the proper functioning of the exchange, stabilizing the exchange cotton contract with the spot-cotton price.

In the address made by the Senator from Louisiana he quoted Mr. Butler, president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, as objecting to the amendment because of its want of clarity. I thought Mr. Butler's objection was correct, and at my request the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] very kindly drew the following amendment to the Comer amendment, meeting Mr. Butler's objection and clarifying the proposed amendment:

Provided, That not less than one-half of each lot of cotton tendered for delivery on, under, or in settlement of a contract for the sale of basis middling made under section 5 of the cotton futures act as amended by the act approved March 4, 1919, on any sale after September 30, 1920, shall be of standard grades of middling or above, consisting of middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, or middling.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] also read into the RECORD a letter to Mr. Wannamaker from Mr. Thompson, ex-president of the Cotton Exchange of New Orleans, from which I quote, in part:

In times past I have made a rather close study of the future contract and I have long since come to the conclusion that its chief and, indeed, its only value lies in the protection it affords buyers and sellers of cotton and manufacturers of cotton goods.

I wish to call the Senator's particular attention that Mr. Thompson states the proper function of an exchange exactly as I have asserted all along. I read further:

When the future contract market functions normally, the owner of cotton, pending such time as he can market the same, or, if he be a farmer, before he has made the same, can insure himself against loss by selling a future contract hedge; the cotton buyer can make forward contracts with the spinner before he has any cotton in hand and protect himself against loss by buying a future contract hedge; and the manufacturer may make forward contracts for the sale of his product before he has cotton in hand or a specific grade contract with spot merchant or broker and insure himself against loss by buying a future contract hedge.

This is exactly what we have urged all along. That is a proper function of the cotton exchange. The proper function is a hedge, a legitimate hedge, either to buy or sell, which is a business proposition. Of course, under this any man can speculate if he wishes to, but he ought to speculate with even chances, just like you throw a half dollar in the air and bet whether or not it will hit the crack, just as you have done many times, but it ought to be an even chance of heads or tails, the only advantage being to the best prognosticator of the crop, large or small, as to how the supply and demand is going to be, successfully diagnosing the futures trade condition, either to buy or sell. This is legitimate and properly belongs to the best judgment.

Mr. Thompson says further:

I am opposed to the Comer amendment because, in my opinion, it so narrows the contract that its effect would be to drive out sellers, which would have the effect of running up the prices of the contract to abnormal premiums, which in turn would eventually destroy the future contract as a trade agency for hedging purposes. If this were the case, there would then be no reason for the existence of a future-contract market and it would not be tolerated.

There is where we draw the diverging line between the exchange contention and the effect of the Comer amendment. We contend that the law, amended as proposed, will stabilize the market, will make it a real insured hedge, just as he says, and beyond that no one proposes to go. The contract will go higher, of course; will promote rather than demote futures business; and the futures business will increase and grow in favor just as an honest business improves over dishonest business.

The Senator from Louisiana quoted extensively from State Senator Percy. I will say that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] told me that Senator Percy was opposed to the bill, and I wrote to Senator Percy, who is a friend of mine—I am very fond of him—to know about it and inclosed a copy of the amendment in my first presentation. His reply was inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], with my consent. I think he was very clear on the question. But I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the closing sentence of Senator Percy's letter:

However, I do not believe that any grave disaster would result from the adoption of the amendment.

Note that:

However, I do not believe that any grave disaster would result from the adoption of the amendment.

If that statement is true—and the Senator quoted it from him and said he was smart enough to know what he is talking about—that contradicts every statement the exchanges have made—every one. If that statement is true, if Senator Percy has diagnosed the case right—that the amendment is not sinister, that it will not hurt the exchange—then I charge that the whole argument falls to the ground as a result.

The Senator has quoted him as a guide in the matter; he has quoted him as one who is competent to guide; and yet he says the amendment is not sinister; but in every argument the exchanges have made they say the amendment is sinister; that it will destroy the cotton exchanges and do great injury to the cotton business. That is what they say. The Senator from Louisiana has quoted ex-Senator Percy injudiciously. I think he made a mistake in quoting him at all. He said:

> My own interest is as a cotton producer. I do not entertain the idea that there is anything sinister in the amendment or that it is designed to operate in favor of the spinners.

And yet these are the very things they have been asserting. The whole fabric of the opposition is based on the amendment being sinister and operating in favor of spinners. I repeat, the Senator from Louisiana quoted ex-Senator Percy injudiciously.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Has the Senator from Alabama finished quoting the letter of ex-Senator Percy? If so, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. COMER. Anything the Senator from Louisiana desires to ask me I shall be very glad to answer. He was very kind to me the other day, and he may ask me anything he pleases and take as much of my time as he desires.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Alabama very much. The Senator says that I have quoted Senator Percy incorrectly. In reply I desire to state that I quoted ex-Senator Percy's entire letter. The Senator from Alabama will admit that, will he not?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. I quoted every word of the letter except a personal allusion in the closing paragraph in regard to the Senator from Alabama hunting with ex-Senator Percy, and I knew the Senator from Alabama did not desire that I should include that. However, I quoted everything that bore on this subject, and let us now see whether I quoted him incorrectly. He says:

> I believe that the amendment to the present contract would make dealings fewer, and the frequency of transactions on the exchanges is beneficial to the producer simply as affording information as to prices and their fluctuation. Since the present contract has been made—

I assume that he alludes to the Smith-Lever law contract. That law was passed in 1914, reenacted in 1916, and an amendment to it adopted in 1919. I assume that that is what he means by "present contract." I continue reading from his letter—> there has been no breaking of the market on tenders in any considerable amount of spot cotton. To make the contract harder to fill for the seller would lessen the number of transactions, and would in all probability make the contracts reflect a higher value than the average value of spot cotton that the trade has become accustomed to; furthermore, the trade has become accustomed to the present contract, and it is the same contract which is in use in Liverpool. I do not believe it would be made a better barometer in reflecting the prices of the actual cotton by the amendment.

It seems to me words could not indicate more plainly than those that ex-Senator Percy is opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. He thinks that if the amendment should be adopted it would not afford a "better barometer." He does add the words to which the Senator refers, that he does not believe the Senator's motives were sinister, and I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama that I do not believe his motives were designing. I believe he was perfectly sincere. Ex-Senator Percy says that as a producer of cotton he does not think the contract would be bettered; that the amendment would make it more difficult of fulfillment; in consequence would lessen the number of transactions on the exchanges; and finally destroy the contract to which the trade is accustomed—the same contract used in Liverpool, the cotton center of the world. Those are the important points of his argument against the Senator's amendment and explain why I read the letter. Ex-Senator Percy, well versed in the trade practices, is a very able man and a very large producer of cotton.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Louisiana does not think my motives were sinister or doubt my perfect sincerity in the matter.

In reference to the question as to whether or not it would reduce the number of sellers, that is not a very great factor any way. I do not myself believe there would be as many gamblers on the market; I mean that class who only go in when they have an unlawful advantage, which is not unlike a marked card or loaded dice game. I myself do not believe that there would be a greater combination to bear the market. That is the very thing against which we are fighting. If you want to encourage such gambling in cotton it can be accomplished under the present system. This is why the exchanges are fighting the amendment, but if it is desired to secure fair dealing and stabilize prices, so that anybody can go into the business with perfect safety, I mean so far as the gambling is concerned, then we should amend existing legislation; and the amendment which I have offered is not detrimental to any interest.

I am glad the Senator from Louisiana has again laid stress on the letter of ex-Senator Percy; but if the Senator will excuse me, he did not read the letter accurately. He said that I had not done anything which was sinister, but the letter itself says that the amendment is not at all sinister. Mr. Percy says the amendment is not going to hurt; he means the amendment will not hurt the exchanges themselves and nothing can hurt them so long as there is honesty in business. That is just exactly what the amendment is meant to accomplish.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator continues to emphasize the point against gamblers. Does he mean to say that ex-Senator Percy is a gambler in cotton? Is that the purport of the Senator's argument? Ex-Senator Percy is very much opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. Now, does the Senator from Alabama pretend to say that ex-Senator Percy is a gambler? Mr. Percy says he is a producer of cotton, and he makes the point that, as a producer of cotton, he is opposed to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. COMER. Mr. Percy certainly is not the kind of gambler that this amendment is designed to checkmate.

Mr. RANSDELL. It may be that some of us who are producers of cotton also bet. I rather think the Senator from Alabama himself said he had bought some futures. He told us about a trade between himself and one of the New Orleans merchants, in which he said, in substance, that he had been treated very badly by that merchant, from whom he bought 100 bales of cotton. I tried to get the Senator to tell the Senate who sold him that 100 bales, but he failed to do so. So ex-Senator Percy may be a speculator, but he could hardly be called a gambler, I imagine. I should very much dislike to have that term applied to him.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Louisiana has mentioned the transaction in New Orleans to which I formerly referred. I am going to state the figures to the Senator, if he please.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to hear them, but I wish the Senator would first tell me whether ex-Senator Percy is a gambler.

Mr. COMER. The Senator from Louisiana must not be personal, if he please. I will ask him, however, if he ever knew a man from the Delta of the Mississippi who was not a gambler or sportsman enough to take a chance?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can look into the mirror and see one. I live in the Delta of the Mississippi, and I am not a gambler.

Mr. COMER. The Senator must feel very lonely sometimes.

The hundred bales of cotton of which I spoke and concerning which the Senator inquires were bought through the Howell Cotton Co., of Birmingham, Ala., and were delivered through Lowrey & Co. at New Orleans. I should like to have the Senator pay particular attention to the figures I am about to read.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to listen.

Mr. COMER. They show exactly how the transaction was carried out. I sent a copy to Senator SMITH of South Carolina, Senator SMITH of Georgia, and to the Bureau of Markets, and I secured this copy from the Bureau of Markets yesterday. The following is a copy of the invoice as made to our company:

Mr. SHEPPARD. From what document has the Senator been reading?

Mr. COMER. I have been reading from the absolute sales sheet from New Orleans of the 100-bale contract as delivered at New Orleans.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under a contract which the Senator had previously made?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And what the Senator has read shows what was actually offered him on the contract?

Mr. COMER. Yes; what was actually delivered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. To the Senator on that contract?

Mr. COMER. Yes; on that contract. We shipped the cotton to the mill at Sylacauga and manufactured it. We have mills there that can manufacture any grade. What I have read shows the multiplex assembly and character of cotton that was actually delivered according to a copy of the sales sheet which has been in the Bureau of Markets since last year, I myself having secured a copy from the Bureau of Markets.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Can the Senator put in the RECORD at this point the contract which he made originally, so that we can compare the contract itself with the figures he has given?

Mr. COMER. The contract was for 100 bales of May cotton, bought under the original Smith-Lever bill as amended in 1916, and delivered within the terms of that law.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COMER. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like the Senator to tell us how many bales of that cotton were not spinnable. Was not all of that cotton spinnable?

Mr. COMER. I will go into a full explanation of that. There are mills that can spin anything. In our mills, as I have stated heretofore, we can spin anything from waste to strict good middling. We have two mills which do not use anything below strict middling, and if any of this cotton were shipped to them we could not have used a bale of it. We have three such mills now, which altogether have 80,000 spindles, and if we had shipped every single bale of this cotton to those mills they could not have used a bale of it. There are many mills, Senator, that could not have used one single, solitary bale of this—not one bale—and when they tendered this cotton, made up as you see it was, it was tendered with the knowledge that it could not be used.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask how many mills the Senator has that he says could not use that cotton?

Mr. COMER. I say our company has three mills that could not use it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Could it be used by any of your mills?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. How many of your mills could use it?

Mr. COMER. My own company?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; or your affiliated companies. I do not know how many mills you really have. I understood that you had quite a number—8 or 10, is it not?

Mr. COMER. Our company has eight. I put that in the RECORD the other day.

Mr. RANSDELL. How many spindles?

Mr. COMER. About 200,000.

Mr. RANSDELL. You say this cotton could have been used by some of your mills?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then, Senator, could it have been very bad if some of your mills could have used it?

Mr. COMER. That is not the question. The average mill could not have used it. The average cotton mill could not have used a bale of it.

Mr. RANSDELL. But, Mr. President——

Mr. COMER. Wait a minute, please—and when you sell to the trade any industrial commodity that can not be used by the average man, it is wrong.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was all spinnable cotton, though?

Mr. COMER. Spinnable, yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. And some of your mills could have used every bale that was tendered to you?

Mr. COMER. Surely.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right.

Mr. COMER. That cotton was from New Orleans. Here is a statement of some cotton that we received from New York. It was about the same time, and I will be candid with you. The futures act was in controversy, and we made the fight two years ago, and we published statements in the different papers of Georgia, Alabama, and South Carolina, and we carried the fight to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. Houston was Secretary at the time. Anybody is at liberty to take that correspondence and print every line of it. We were fighting for the people's rights, which were being disregarded.

We took up cotton on two contracts in New York and one in New Orleans for the special purpose of showing Congress what was being done under the law of the land. That is what we did it for. We did not have to take the cotton at all, but we wanted to have you see just what was going on, and we sent copies to the Senators from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to show Congress just what was going on; and we demanded, as citizens and representatives of the business of this country, that we should be protected in the right to do a straight, square business. That is what we did. We took up two contracts in New York. I will read from the sale sheet——

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. In order that we may understand the matter clearly as we go along, I wish the Senator would explain whether, in getting supplies of cotton for his mills, he purchases on a specific contract, in which he sets out the exact number of bales and kind of cotton he desires, to wit, middling, or strict middling, or good middling, or strict good middling, or middling fair, or low middling, and so forth. Does he make a specific, definite, concrete contract to be delivered, so many bales of particular grade, or does he depend upon getting supplies for his mills in the future market, on which the basis of the contract is middling?

Mr. COMER. Just as you said just now, Senator. You read Mr. Thompson's letter to Wannamaker, in which he declared that the function of the exchange was not to deliver cotton, but that it was insurance to protect the transactions in cotton. That is what it is for. We buy contracts for insurance or protection, and up to this time I want to show you how closely it was done. Up to April of last year, for quite a while, the exchange market had been running pretty fairly well along with the cotton market; but commencing in May the drop was 5 cents at one time, $25 a bale. It came like a thunderclap on our business; and I say to you, Senator, that a law that allows such transactions as that is wrong.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator kindly answer my question?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. I say, assuming that you need 10,000 bales, or 50,000 bales—I do not know how many bales your mills would use; probably 50,000 bales—if you needed 50,000 bales, then would you make specific contracts to be delivered, those 50,000 bales of particular grades, a certain number of bales per month, or—repeating my question—would you depend upon getting them on a future contract, in the future market?

Mr. COMER. We could either ourselves hedge in the futures market, buying that much cotton for such months ahead as we would like, depending ourselves on buying direct, or from such sources as we saw proper, the spot cotton that we needed, and as the spot cotton was acquired could sell the hedge. In that event there would be no specific grade contract; again, we frequently buy specific grades from a dealer at a specific price, either made on a futures basis month or an absolute price which he has figured as based on a futures month; and this is really the "cream" of the stabilized market, because just as he can safely depend upon the futures market correlated with the spot market, then to such an extent would his contract be insured or noninsured.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then, do I understand the Senator to say that he makes specific contracts or that he does not?

Mr. COMER. We do not make specific contracts on the exchange.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not mean on the exchange. I mean for the cotton which you need in your business, this 50,000 bales.

Mr. COMER. Thousands of bales of it; yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. You make specific contracts?

Mr. COMER. Thousands of bales, yes; but not on the exchanges.

Mr. RANSDELL. You do not buy on the exchange, except, I presume, to insure or hedge against your actual transactions?

Mr. COMER. That is right.

Mr. RANSDELL. You use it, then, as a medium of insurance?

Mr. COMER. To be sure. That is what it is for. That is its function; and let me tell you, Senator, since you have brought up that question, this last year we all thought that the Smith-Lever bill was going to do. We all thought the amendment had accomplished its purpose and the contract market went along smoothly until last fall. Last summer and early fall the exchange prices were running along with the spot cotton prices, and there were thousands of dealers who sold middling and above, based on the exchange price. They sold cotton, and then bought futures; but in less than 60 days there was a revolution in the exchanges. Spot middling and above advanced from 200 to 300 points. It went up just like this; and those unfortunate dealers trusting your law for protection had sold spot cotton middling and above, basis contract middling, depending on the proper functioning of the exchanges because of the last amendment to the Smith-Lever bill lost tens of thousands of dollars, all because the exchanges failed to function as Mr. Thompson says they should.

It was wrong. It was wrong. They had insured in the exchanges. They had a right to expect the exchanges to function in the way the law intended they should function and the right to believe they were protected. Not merely in my section of the country but all through the country those people who trusted in the exchange market as it existed then, and sold the higher grades of cotton, middling and above, suffered because they did not anticipate that the exchanges would permit this great difference between the middling basis and the middling spots—a difference that was factitiously accomplished.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. When you make a contract for middling and ask for specific delivery of the 100 bales under your contract, or the 1,000 bales under your 10 contracts—I believe 100 bales is called a contract, is it not?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. Now, assume that you have made a contract for 1,000 bales, let us say, of middling, and the New York Exchange or the New Orleans Exchange attempts to deliver you a certain percentage of that in low middling, for example, or strict low middling, will they not pay you the difference, the commercial difference or a fair difference, between the value of low middling and the value of that which they deliver?

Mr. COMER. If they paid the commercial difference, the differences as actually exist in the spot market and which the Smith-Lever bill intended, it would be right. It would straighten out the whole transaction, but they vary the differences between the grades and the actual difference in the spot market so much that no man can take account of it or guard against it.

Mr. RANSDELL. You mean the trouble is in the practical application of the matter, then?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir: I mean when you bring it down to practical application, they are not there. That is what I mean.

Mr. RANSDELL. You mean they do not treat you fairly?

Mr. COMER. That is just exactly what I mean. The contract market as at present conducted admits of fictitious differentials between the grades of cotton tendered for delivery.

Mr. RANSDELL. If they do not treat you fairly at the present time, may I ask how you expect to get fair treatment even if your amendment should be adopted?

Mr. COMER. The amendment secures that one-half of the contract shall be middling and above, the tendency will be to make the basis of this contract on the actual spot price middling instead of basis spot price middling, as at present. The present contract basis middling is secured by getting the spot prices from actual spot sales from 10 spot markets on 10 different grades and from it compositing the differentials, making the basis middling, which is impossible.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I just wanted to say, on the particular point the Senator has raised, that my object in my amendment that was adopted and is now a law was, as I take it, in the main what the Senator from Alabama is attempting to bring about, namely, not so much to make the exchanges a spot market as to regulate them in such a way as to make them reflect the real commercial value of the spot market. In other words, the object was to restrict the grades delivered to such grades that in case they are called for delivery they will have to furnish those grades that are nearest the standard of comparison, above and below, so that at all times you may know what middling is worth; and when you sell a contract or buy a contract that contract will be bought and sold upon the basis of the middle or middling grade, which has been from time immemorial the standard of comparison.

Now, I wanted to suggest to the Senator that perhaps there was an evasion of the cotton-futures act, which penalized one for not discharging his obligations when called. I was informed—just how true it was I was not in a position to know, as I was not myself then engaged in the cotton business—that New York fixed a nominal sum as a penalty for nondelivery or default on the contract in case a buyer demanded the cotton.

I think it was some absurdly low figure; but, be that as it may, markets such as New Orleans and New York should be so regulated, or should themselves so regulate themselves, that when they quote January, February, March, April, or May, or any month of the year, at a certain figure, that will represent the price of middling cotton at that time. The public at large so considers it to-day, but through some manipulation of the figures it has not reflected that price.

If the Senator will recall, when this difference between the low grades and the middle grades and between the middling contract price and the middling spot price became so absurd, he came to Washington, and the Senator will remember that we were present with the then head of the Bureau of Markets, and I asked the question if the price then quoted for middling cotton represented the price of middling cotton, or whether it represented a composite, an average price of the grades that they would deliver. If you recall I never did get a specific and satisfactory answer to that question. Now the Senator proposes in his amendment to give the buyer the right to demand 50 per cent of any contract middling and better, so that any one selling even for a hedge will know that in case notice is given that the cotton will be taken up, he has got to go into the market or into the warehouses and get at least 50 per cent of middling and better.

In that respect it would have a tendency, in my opinion, to bring the quoted price, the board price, nearer in line with the spot price. Just what effect it will have upon the grades below is yet to be determined.

If the Senator will allow me, I think the disparity between middling grades and the low grades of cotton has been affected to a considerable degree by the unfortunate order of the Government, which the Senator recalls, that nothing should be made for a Government account, from horse collars to shirts, out of any cotton below middling, which had the effect on the market of still further lowering the difference between middling and the offgrades. But whether or not the still further restriction of the grades will intensify that difference remains to be seen.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] called attention to the fact that all this cotton was spinnable cotton. It is true that under the tests by the Government it was shown that so far as the tensile strength, the bleaching qualities, and the cloth-making qualities of the grades of cotton were concerned, from good ordinary to middling fair, they were negligible; but there was quite a difference in the per cent of waste, the foreign matter, that was in the lower grades of cotton.

However, I want to take this occasion, because I may not be present all the time this afternoon on account of circumstances over which I have no control, being obliged to attend a committee meeting, to say that the ultimate price of cotton is going to depend upon the law of supply and demand. What I have been striving for since I have been in the Senate, and I think I have approximated it through the aid and cooperation of the friends of this article, is to bring the market to where whatever price is quoted will reflect the price of the article based upon the law of supply and demand.

Mr. COMER. That is true, Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. How near we have approximated that is shown in the market since the operation of the amendment to the cotton-futures act passed last March. I frankly admit that there has been some disappointment on my part that the spot market was not reflected precisely in the future market, but I understood that there would necessarily be a variation from it, in view of the fact that through the unfortunate Government order and the necessary accumulation of certain low grades the preponderance of the cotton to be delivered on any contract would be taken from the lower grades that were admissible. But even that has not, in my opinion, justified the variations of the spot quotations from middling and the quotations from the spot market.

Mr. COMER. May I read to you, Senator, just what the variation is?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I would like to have it.

Mr. COMER. On February 20, in New York, March cotton was 36.52; May cotton was 34.34; July cotton was 32.12.

At New Orleans March cotton the same day was 37.48; May cotton was 34.84; July cotton was 32.67.

You will observe, Senator, that at New Orleans cotton was just a cent a pound higher for the March contract than at New York.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What was the spot cotton on the dates the Senator mentioned?

Mr. COMER. I think it was around 40 or 41 cents; I am not sure, but it was around 40 cents.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What was the date of that report?

Mr. COMER. That was February 20. I want to give the Senator the comparisons. On March 1, March in New York was 38.25. You see, it had gone up nearly a cent. May was 34.98; July was 32.40.

At New Orleans March cotton was 39 cents; May was 35.67; July was 32.94.

On March 15—I am just giving it to you in intervals of 15 days; I am not picking out any spectacular months—on March 15, March was 40 cents in New York; May cotton was 37.09; July was 34.20.

At New Orleans March was 39.20, a cent lower than New York. They just swapped a cent. May cotton was 37.25 and July cotton was 34.55.

On March 20—I am taking these five days apart—March in New York was 40.25, nearly up to the price for middling; May was 37.57; and July was 35.10.

At New Orleans the price was 39 cents for March, a cent and a quarter lower than New York, a basis change of 2¼ cents; 37.52 for May; and 34.96 for July.

On March 23 in New York March was 42.80; May was 38.76; and July was 35.96.

In New Orleans March was 39.60; May was 38; and July was 35.

In other words, New Orleans basis middling then was 3¼ cents lower than New York, and February 20 was a cent higher. Do you not see, Senator, that that is manipulation? Do you not see that is not a hedge? Do you not see that is not insurance? Do you not see that that was destruction of the very thing Thompson said he stood for? And do you not see it destroys the entire argument of Senator Percy when he said the thing was running satisfactorily along? Do you not see it? How can you understand the change of 6 cents a pound in a month when spot cotton had not changed a cent and a half? And yet you say that is fair. Fair is not the name for it.

On the 23d of March New York did go to 43.18, and they said it was a squeeze. New York had no cotton, and has none now, and when March was 36.52 and spot 40 cents, it was too big a temptation for the man on the outside not to take advantage of, and he called for some cotton; March contracts was called, March contracts advanced in New York; advanced to the price of what it cost to carry spot cotton there and deliver it, and when you urge the danger of these conditions you must consider that the man who is selling it on the exchange can ship the cotton and deliver it. Then, besides, he has the privilege under certain conditions of settling 25 points on the closing price of the expiring month. Both these constitute an absolute safety valve.

We want a market which does not change that way. We want a market that is stabilized. Stabilized on what? On spot cotton.

The exchanges can not make a fiat value on cotton. It would be most dangerous if they could, and the claim of the exchanges establishing differences in grades and being of advantage to low grades, or any grades, is fiat and is impossible of accomplishment. We failed to establish a fiat price on silver as money, as it became dangerous, too dangerous to carry out. We can not even make a fiat value on gold, the very basis of all currency, the value of it fluctuating with the market of the world; and how contemptible becomes the position of the exchanges' argument that they establish value in cotton, the different grades of it, being inlawed or outlawed as to value according to whether or not it is tenderable on the exchange.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator as to the real trouble with the present situation, and I presume I should preface it by saying I presume not 1 per cent of these men use the exchanges, but they are affected by the exchanges; but the mill people, when they sell a contract for goods and have not the cotton, buy a contract on the market in order to protect themselves against the exigencies under the market. Of course, the wide fluctuations to which the Senator calls attention are unfortunate.

Mr. COMER. It is outrageous.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the trouble with the hedging business, especially with the mills, is this, that they sell or buy, as the case may be, on the exchange as a protection, a hedge, against the spot transaction; so that if they sell a contract on the board to protect the purchase of spot cotton, and there is violent fluctuation on the board and none on the spots, they are likely to be knocked out of all profit they have on the cotton.

Mr. COMER. That is just what is the matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I say, that is the point. For instance, in the very case cited spot cotton remained practically stationary, while there was a decline in the future market of 3 or 4 cents a pound, which wiped out all protection, and yet the effect was felt by the producer only indirectly, in that it demoralized the purchasers, namely, those who were buying for mill account. So that it is not so much the fluctuation of the market that is disastrous to the hedger—that is, if spots and futures fluctuate pari passu—but it is when spots remain relatively firm and the futures go up and go down, because if I were to sell a contract on the New York Exchange today, say, at 40 cents, basis middling, intending to purchase my spot cotton, and from some manipulation of the market it should go down to 38, when spots went to 45, I would be just split wide open——

Mr. COMER. And under the law, which is wrong.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The result would be that I would have no hedge, and have to do one of two things—go out to the warehouses and buy my specific cotton first hand for my future needs, or stay out of the market as a hedge.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, would the Senator from Alabama permit me to ask a question?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina what would be the effect in the case he stated if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama be agreed to? How would it materially improve the situation?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only thing in the premises, I take it, that the Senator from Alabama is striving to do is to so relate the spot and future markets that when one goes up the other goes up, and when one goes down the other goes down.

Mr. COMER. That is where they belong.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I knew that was what the Senator was attempting to do. But as to what effect the amendment would have——

Mr. RANSDELL. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As to just what effect the amendment may have on the general price of cotton is problematical, just as it was problematical when I had it restricted to 10 grades. I expected more benefit in a way, but I had not properly discounted the effect of the Government order. However, it remains to be seen; I do not know just what use those who deal in it will put it to.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask one other question in line with this?

Mr. COMER. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from South Carolina, I take it, has been as great a student of this subject as we have in the country—certainly the most attentive student of it in the Senate—and he says that in his opinion the effect of the amendment would be very problematical. I imagine from that statement by the Senator that although he perhaps has thought a great deal about this matter, and notwithstanding his great knowledge and mastery of the subject, he must be in the greatest doubt as to whether or not we should adopt the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I frankly admit that I am a bit skeptical at this stage of the game of gratifying results from almost any law we may pass, for the reason that it seems as if there is some way found to evade the specific intent and purpose of the law.

But the purpose for which I rose was to ask the Senator from Alabama if it was his intent in the amendment to so legally bind the spot and future markets together as to make it impossible for one to rise without the other rising, pair fashion, and the decline of the same?

Mr. COMER. I can answer immediately—the very minute that this goes into effect as a law, that then the contract market would base on the middling market or very near to it. At present it is basis middling, which can, as I just showed you, be 4 or 5 cents a pound under the spot market. This will make it basis spot market and basis middling. You will have practically one basis. That is, I think it will operate that way.

Going on with my statement, on March 24 New Orleans had changed positions with New York about 4 cents a pound. Something was wrong, was it not? Then here is the 22d May, New York 40.91, July 38.85. It had changed 2 cents. Then, on April 29, May was 40.20 New York, July 38.20, and New Orleans was 39.20, a cent lower, and it had been running anywhere from three-quarters to a cent and a half higher.

The point is this: New York is now largely functioning, and functioning very close to the spot market. Is anything hurt by that fact? Do you not know it helps them; that if by any means it could be secured that New York and New Orleans should function together on the spot market, then the trouble would be over?

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator think that as a result of his amendment, should it be agreed to, that the differences between the spot and the future markets would become practically the same and that we would have in the futures market substantially the same differences as in the spot market?

Mr. COMER. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. RANSDELL. Suppose that should be the result; I ask the Senator if that would not so restrict the market that dealers would not invest in these future contracts? Would it not contract and narrow it in such a manner that people would not deal in futures, and therefore the Senator would lose the very insurance that he is seeking to secure?

In other words, he would kill the goose that lays the golden egg which seems so important to his mills. The Senator finds that he must have an insurance and an insurance medium. The exchanges are the insurance medium. If he so narrows the contract as to restrict and tie the hands of the people who wish to gamble, if you please, or to speculate, who buy contracts from time to time on the market, will they not be prevented from taking the risk of underwriting the insurance or guaranty the Senator finds so important and essential to his business prosperity?

Mr. COMER. The only business that will be restricted is the gambler who insists on a market allowing marked cards, loaded dice, with which the game is to be played. That is the man we are trying to get rid of, but it will certainly help legitimate trading. In other words, it will multiply the business men who will want to insure their business by legitimate hedging.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to assure the Senator that if he can convince me that the cards are marked or the dice loaded, I shall be delighted to assist him in enacting any law that will prevent such dealings, for I certainly have no more in common with transactions of that sort than he has. However, I believe the Senate ought to be assured that in attempting to eradicate this alleged unconscionable system of trading that it does not deliver a death blow to legitimate and necessary business on the exchanges, which, according to the committee report on the cotton-futures act, stand as "the only buffer between the helpless producer and the powerful buyer of his product"—the spinner.

Mr. COMER. Convince you? Here you are, sir. We sold, if you remember, 200 bales in New York. This was delivered through Carpenter & Co.; nice people. They did not buy the cotton. They were simply our brokers, our commission house. They took up for us 100 bales of cotton in New York, and here is what they took: Six bales of strict low middling, 11 bales of low middling, 22 bales of strict good ordinary, 3 bales of good ordinary, 4 bales of strict middling tinge yellow, 14 bales middling tinge, 31 bales of strict low middling tinge, 14 bales low middling tinge, 1 bale of middling stains yellow, 1 bale of strict middling stains blue, and 2 bales of middling stains blue. That makes 109 bales. What do you think of that kind of a delivery?

I will show you the sequence of that transaction. We both wrote and wired them to sell that cotton, that we could not use it, but they could neither sell nor exchange it.

We telegraphed them:

Please see if you can get offer to exchange the 109 bales spots for all white cotton, say, average middling; nothing below strict low middling.

They wired back:

Premium on white cotton probably 5 to 6 cents over July. Trying to get offer of some kind on your contract.

We wired them:

Want to know if you can exchange the 106 bales spots for all white cotton; nothing below strict low middling, and at what difference.

They replied:

Impossible to exchange your contract for white cotton.

Then we wired them:

Is there no spot dealer willing to make the exchange at a price? Would appreciate effort to get offer.

Here is what they answered:

No one willing to make such an exchange. Best thing to do deliver hundred six bales on contract and buy hundred bales of spots in open market.

"The best thing you can do is to sell contract and redeliver 106 bales of spot cotton." That is what Carpenter & Co. advised, and that is what we did. The above game was played with loaded dice.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, my only observation on that is that I know nothing whatever about the transaction to which the Senator alludes, but there is a possibility of unfairness and injustice being practiced under the terms of virtually every law. No matter how legislation may attempt to prohibit these practices in the business transactions of the world some men will conduct them in a way not equitable to all parties concerned.

As the Senator read that list, some of those bales of cotton were not deliverable under the contract. Some of them were below low middling. They actually tried to deliver some cotton which could not be delivered, which was not tenderable.

Mr. COMER. That was before the last Smith-Lever Act amendment.

Mr. RANSDELL. Perhaps so. Then good ordinary was deliverable at that time.

Mr. COMER. I have given this to you straight from the bat, and it is not business and should be unlawful. Even under the amended law the Bureau of Markets makes the exchange prices by compositing prices as described from 10 spot markets. Think of getting reliable daily prices from 10 spot markets on 10 different types of cotton. It is absolute nonsense. It is like the new way they measure the distance to the fixed stars, as I said the other day. They guess one-fourth of the distance and multiply it by 4. When the Bureau of Markets attempts to make a basis price, or composite price, from 10 spot markets on 10 different grades it is nonsense.

Mr. RANSDELL. How ought they to do it?

Mr. COMER. I am going to ask the secretary of the Bureau of Markets to limit to five. It ought not to be over four. The fact of the business is, it ought to be delivered on the commercial price, spot price; if we are tendering on a basis price, basis price should be middling of the market and not a factitious middling. It is too contemptible to think of.

Then you talk about exchange deliveries. There is a great deal said about getting cotton from the exchanges. I have spoken here as earnestly as I knew how and made it as clear as I possibly could that cotton does not come from the exchanges. The exchange is simply an index of the price, yet we have men of fine sense who will gravely argue with you that if you put this amendment in it will be impossible for them to deliver the cotton. The exchange propaganda gravely asserts this, and they know it is moonshine of the flimsiest character.

I will tell you how much cotton New York has had certificated this year—it sold millions of bales of contracts. It certificated 7,676 bales, and yet they will gravely assert that cotton is delivered through the exchanges. There is not one of them that does not know it is not true.

Spot cotton is not bought through the exchange. A future contract is a hedge against the market, and you go where the cotton is to buy it, and you buy the spot cotton at the market price. The exchange does not make the price. It can not make the price, and it has no right to try to make value. The exchanges are going out and saying abroad in the land, "Pass this law and you outlaw a whole lot of low-grade cotton and cause thousands of people to suffer." That is the sheerest nonsense, and they know it. It does not inlaw nor outlaw any cotton. When a man gets up and gravely asserts that it is the spinners' contract, and against low-grade cotton, that man ought to have his head examined; that is, if he is a business man. It is not true, and it can not be true.

You heard the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] say a while ago that cotton was bought and sold on the basis of supply and demand. That is true. That is the only market for cotton, and it is the only market for anything.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator, as I understand, says that when anyone asserts that it is a spinners' contract he ought to have his head examined.

Mr. COMER. Surely.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have not made that assertion, and so, of course, I know the Senator has not applied the remark to me.

Mr. COMER. I am not applying anything to the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. But the assertion was made in a number of the letters and telegrams which I read several days ago. Now, I want to call the Senator's attention merely to the headlines of the Montgomery Journal of Saturday, April 10:

Senator COMER'S speech before the Senate April 3, 1920, amending the cotton-futures act, stabilizing futures values and making them approximate commercial value, discouraging violent speculations and erratic differences between contract market and spot cotton.

Senator GRONNA, who is chairman of the conference committee, in questioning Senator COMER, declared that the decision in conference will depend entirely upon the Representatives from the cotton States.

The question is, Will they favor the farmer or listen to the exchange gamblers' propaganda?

Farmers and others interested should take immediate action.

The article seems to occupy five and a little over one-half columns—practically a whole page—of the Montgomery Journal of April 10, and at the bottom I see the word "Advertisement."

I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama, without intending to be personal in the least, if that speech of his was paid for by the producers, by the cotton exchanges, or by the spinners, and in whose interest that advertisement was inserted in the Montgomery Journal?

Mr. COMER rose.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator wishes, I will make one question of the whole, as I have two or three other similar articles here.

I will now read from the Montgomery Advertiser of Friday, April 16. The headline is:

Paper by B. B. COMER read before the convention of the American Cotton Association.

It occupies nearly three and a quarter columns. At the bottom it is marked "Advertisement," and purports to be an address by the Senator from Alabama, which was read before the convention of the American Cotton Association in Montgomery, Ala.

I read next from the "State," of Columbia, S. C., of Thursday morning, April 29, 1920, as follows:

SENATOR COMER'S SPEECH BEFORE THE SENATE, APRIL 17, 1920.

Senator COMER'S speech before the Senate, April 17, going very thoroughly into every objection to his proposed amendment to the cotton-futures act—trying to stabilize contract cotton with spot cotton, making the contracts more truly represent spot values—he shows that the cotton exchanges are trying to reach and prejudice Members of Congress by propaganda telegrams from various interests incited by them endeavoring by every possible means to maintain their speculative advantages by which they have gerrymandered the price of cotton for years, gathering unwarranted gains. The exchange propaganda makes all kinds of absurd statements, dogmatic and impossible of proof; using every effort to create prejudice between producer, dealer, and spinner; holding themselves up as the guardian of the farmer and trying to make the laws governing their relation to the handling of this greatest of world products. Farmers, legitimate dealers, take notice. The issue is the gamblers' interest against yours. The exchanges are using every method to control your representatives. Will you be idle?

Those are the headlines, in large letters, at the head of this article, which occupies all of one page of the "State," Columbia, S. C., of the 29th of April, except a fraction over one-half column. At the end of it is printed the word "Advertisement."

Now, I again ask the Senator whether these three advertisements—and I presume others, for I have understood that similar advertisements were published in the papers of other States as well as those of Alabama and South Carolina—were paid for by the spinners or by the cotton producers or by the cotton exchanges, and if so, what was the purpose? Whom have the producers got to meet in this propaganda?

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Louisiana has called attention to this matter. The Senator has not all of the papers in which this publication was made?

Mr. RANSDELL. No; there are several others, I think, but I have not the papers here.

Mr. COMER. We are trying to have similar articles published in Dallas; in Oklahoma; in Little Rock; Memphis; Atlanta; Macon; Raleigh; Greensboro, N. C.; Greenville, S. C.; and Columbia, S. C.

I will state further that last year we ourselves made the propaganda, and we published articles in the papers of Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, and North Carolina. That is one reason why those States to-day know what they are doing; that is why they realize the situation. We did not publish articles in Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Texas and other States, and that is one reason that the people in those States are not acquainted with the issue. If we had gone to those States last year and showed the conditions as they were, then we would not now have so much trouble.

Mr. RANSDELL rose.

Mr. COMER. The Senator will wait a moment, if he please——

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. COMER. That was last year. This year we paid for the publication of the matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. To whom does the Senator refer when he says "we"?

Mr. COMER. The Avondale mills.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator means his own mills?

Mr. COMER. I mean our own mills. Not one dollar was collected anywhere else.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator means there were no other contributors?

Mr. COMER. I will say to the Senator that I mean we conducted the whole thing. If we get a stabilized contract it will be worth a very great deal not only to our mills but to everybody with whom we have business. As regards my own feeling about such matters it is different from that entertained by some others.

I made a fight in Alabama for a better freight rate, for better conditions for the people who live and labor in the State, to change it from a reactionary State and make it a progressive State. I have spent 10 years of my own time and $50,000 of my own money to do that. I thought it was a service well rendered, and I shall never regret a day of the time or a dollar of the money expended, nor shall I regret the effort I have made if this amendment shall be carried through, taking care as it does of every man who raises cotton, of every man who deals in cotton, or who manufactures cotton. That is the ultimate object of the amendment, and I do not care who he is who asserts to the contrary, he does not know what he is talking about.

Of course, that is the object of the amendment. From whom does the cotton mill buy the cotton? From the dealer. From whom does the dealer buy it? From the producer. When the cotton exchanges send out their propaganda to arouse prejudice against those people, why are they doing it, and what for? Is it to help the farmer, to help the dealer? They never work for those causes.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator just stated that he carried on this propaganda last year and this year in North Carolina and South Carolina and hence the people of those States were educated.

Mr. COMER. I forgot to say that we did not get into North Carolina very much, but we got in there to some extent.

Mr. RANSDELL. You got into South Carolina?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator certainly had the advertisement in a Little Rock paper, in North Carolina papers, and in South Carolina papers; and yet the States that voted against his amendment at the great cotton convention in Montgomery, Ala., a short time ago were Arkansas, Louisiana, North Carolina, Mississippi, and South Carolina. So certainly those States which were educated by the Senator's articles did not go with him on that vote.

Mr. COMER. The president of that convention was Mr. Wannamaker. The first telegram I published in the RECORD in regard to this matter was from Mr. Wannamaker at the very beginning of this controversy, strongly favoring the amendment, standing for it, and wishing it success. That telegram is published in the RECORD and Senators can read it for themselves.

Mr. Wannamaker voted against the amendment at the Montgomery convention. Why did he vote against it? Because he said he did not want politics brought into a cotton convention; that is why. The day I received the telegram that the cotton convention had voted 15 to 16, I read the names of the States voting, and I asked the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], "Is not South Carolina for the amendment?" He said, "It certainly is"; and to-day I understand that every Representative from South Carolina stands for it. By the way, I promised to read a letter concerning that convention.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be very glad to hear it.

Mr. COMER. It is from ex-Senator White. The Senator, I think, knows who he is.

Mr. RANSDELL. I know him very well.

Mr. COMER. He is one of the nicest men I ever saw.

Mr. RANSDELL. He is a fine man.

Mr. COMER. And one of the fairest men I ever knew. He was a representative at that convention. By the way, he is a candidate to succeed the late Senator Bankhead, and a better man could not be elected.

Reading Senator White's letter:

We had a very stubborn, and, I am inclined to think, unscrupulous opposition—

Does the Senator from Louisiana hear that?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes.

Mr. COMER. I repeat:

We had a very stubborn, and, I am inclined to think, unscrupulous opposition. The resolution indorsing the amendment was referred to the committee on resolutions, which was stopped against us. The committee lost the resolution—

He means they lost the paper—

When we learned this we got the legislative enactment committee to originate an indorsement of the amendment. Had a favorable report to the board of directors, then had the board of directors indorse it, which was accomplished with difficulty. We finally had a test vote, then on a recount we got one majority—

On a recount, on the test vote, there was one vote counted against it that did not belong there, and on the matter being called to the attention of the chair the question was brought back and carried in favor of the resolution—

After this action was obtained the resolution committee found the resolution and put in a report referring it to a committee to investigate and report at the next session of the association; this meant to chloroform it. When the committee reported I moved to amend it on the floor of the convention by inserting an indorsement of your resolution, the chairman saying that the matter would be acted on in a few minutes by the board of directors, and that then it would come up in the convention. When the board of directors reported they chloroformed it by referring it to the committee for investigation.

Did the Senator from Louisiana ever hear of that kind of procedure?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have heard of such things happening.

Mr. COMER. It does not sound like the report the Senator read the other day, does it?

I moved to amend the report by indorsing the amendment, after two or three hours' fight on the floor, in which Col. Thompson, ex-president of the New Orleans Exchange, urged that the matter be postponed, saying it would injure the association.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator if he wishes to pursue that line further, or shall I ask him a further question now in regard to these articles?

Mr. COMER. I want to explain them further.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right; I will not bother the Senator.

Mr. COMER. I did not answer you enough on that.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall ask my question later, then.

Mr. COMER. Senator, I differ, I believe, with some folks on those things. Whenever I was trying to serve the public, it was not a question of expense. It was a question of whether or not service could be rendered; and if it took ten times what it cost to make this fight before the people, if they would understand, we would think it money well spent. I am one of those who do not believe that everybody has to be selfish all the time, and in reciting these facts to you, they are not dogmatic. There is no dogmatic assertion. Everything, every single, solitary thing, that I assert I can prove. What I am stating here is the result of actual experience in the proposition. I am giving you experience. I am not giving you dogmatic assertions, or propaganda, or anything of that kind.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, would the Senator mind saying how much he has expended on this propaganda? It must have cost a great deal.

Mr. COMER. How much would you think, Senator?

Mr. RANSDELL. I should think a good many thousands of dollars. If I should insert an advertisement taking up a whole page of a big daily paper, I would expect to pay a large sum of money for it. I imagine you must have spent a good many thousands of dollars.

Mr. COMER. Senator, there is this difference: When you insert anything, that is a political advertisement. This is a commercial advertisement, you understand. They are two different propositions.

Mr. RANSDELL. Perhaps so.

Mr. COMER. Anybody can see that it is a commercial advertisement. Anybody can see that this does not redound to my benefit, you understand. It is to work out a principle, for the protection of what? That thing that we ought to have had years ago—the protection of the cotton of the South, the cotton business of the world.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question at this time? I believe the Senator agrees with me that the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record is a fair index of conditions in the South, and usually is an impartial paper, is it not?

Mr. COMER. I should think so.

Mr. RANSDELL. Has it not been a great champion of the South, especially the cotton industry of the South, for many years?

Mr. COMER. I think so.

Mr. RANSDELL. I find on page 79 of the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record for the 29th of April this statement:

ENORMOUS PROFITS OF SOUTHERN COTTON MILLS.

The Tucapau Mills, of Spartanburg, S. C., one of the big cotton manufacturers of the South, has just declared a stock dividend of 303 per cent, and the Spartanburg Herald reports that $850 a share was bid for the stock of this company. The Easley Mills, of Easley, S. C., has also declared a stock dividend of 300 per cent, payable in preferred stock, yielding 7 per cent a year. The Saxon Mills has declared a stock dividend of 100 per cent, and other mills are reported as likely to declare large stock dividends.

While the amazing prosperity of the cotton-mill industry is adding enormously to the wealth of the South, these great dividends show that the cotton mills could have paid a much higher price for cotton and still have earned enormous profits. Unquestionably, the cotton producers have not had a fair division of this prosperity.

Now, I want to ask the Senator—and if it is not a fair question I will withdraw it—if the Alabama mills have made profits in the same proportion as the South Carolina mills, and if the cotton producers of Alabama have reaped anything like the same proportion of profits that the cotton mills of Alabama have realized?

Mr. COMER. In answer to your question, Senator, I think the cotton mills everywhere have been prosperous. Referring to one of the great items that you mention there, however—the dividends declared—I wish to say that if you take a mill of 100,000 spindles erected three years ago the increase in the cost of that mill to-day is 300 per cent.

It costs four times as much to build a mill now as it used to. For the last mill we put up we paid $1.58 a spindle; to-day the price is $6.50 a spindle. The last cards we put up was $400 a card, and to-day the price is $1,400 a card; and if you happen to have any of that property the increment of increased value puts the per cent up; of course it does.

Then, besides that, you take construction: The first mill we built cost $4.50 per thousand for brick; to-day the price of brick is $20 per thousand. The price of lumber was $9 a thousand; the price now is around $80 a thousand. Those things are going along. But, Senator, I am not talking about the prosperity of the exchanges. We want the exchanges to be prosperous and we want the cotton mills to be prosperous. We want the exchanges to stabilize; to let the law of supply and demand indicate value—the value of commerce—and not a factitious and fictitious value. That is what we want. We do not begrudge them any earnings whatever. We do not care what they earn; we want to see the whole country prosperous—not one section, but every section.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I want to say to the Senator that I am delighted that these mills have made a big profit. I hope his mills made as big a profit in proportion as these South Carolina mills. My only regret is that the cotton growers did not make much profit. I know I did not. I certainly did not pay any income tax on my cotton crop last year.

The cotton convention which we have talked about so much passed a resolution saying—and that was unanimous, Senator; I do not think there was any dissent on that—that, while they would not attempt to specify any price for cotton, the cotton mills could well afford to pay 60 cents a pound for it instead of present prices, considering the enormous profits they have made. Now, it seems to me in all of this discussion that we ought to look a little after the producing end of this proposition as well as the spinning end.

I am standing here in my humble way not only to defend the Cotton Exchange of New Orleans, but particularly that great industry in which I myself am engaged, the production of cotton. It is my only business. As I said several days ago in speaking here, I am not connected with the exchange. I live more than 300 miles from New Orleans, and rarely get there. I have not been on the floor of the exchange in years, but I am tremendously interested in the production end of the cotton industry; and when I see the statement made by repsesentative conventions that the cotton mills could afford to pay 60 cents a pound, and when I read to the Senator a statement published in this great journal that three mills of South Carolina declared stock dividends of over 300 per cent last year, and then the Senator goes on and talks to me about the evils of the exchange, I can not help thinking that the Senator ought to explain somewhat why those mills were making that enormous per cent in this day of the high cost of living, at this time when there is so much talk about profiteering, when somebody has recently inaugurated a scheme to add further profits to the cotton mills by persuading everybody to use overalls, when everyone knows overalls are made of cotton. Of course, I know the Senator did not do anything of that kind, and I do not charge that it was done in the interest of the cotton mills, but it certainly is one of the direct results of that program. If everybody wears overalls, there will be more demand for cotton products.

Mr. COMER. All goods that are sold, Senator, even cotton goods, even overalls, are sold in the world's market on the basis of supply and demand, and the cotton mills have been doing the same thing. That is exactly what they want the exchanges to do. We want them on the supply and demand market, the world market. That is what we want. There is nothing else to it than that.

Now, to prove to the satisfaction of everybody that the exchanges do not deliver cotton, that they were never intended to deliver cotton, and the falsity of all this stuff to the effect that if you pass this amendment then the exchanges will be knocked sky-high, because they can not get the cotton to deliver—that is what they say—I am going to read you, Senator, the amount of cotton certificated in New York this year on the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Do you mean by "certified" sold through the exchange?

Mr. COMER. No; that was turned in for sale.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Was it sold?

Mr. COMER. Some of it was. Some of it was delivered. You know they had a squeeze in March, Senator. They were selling cotton the last of February at 36.52.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Who turned that in, and how did they get it?

Mr. COMER. Oh, they bought it on the markets of the world. You buy it anywhere. That is where you get cotton, on the markets.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Do you mean that the members of the exchange bought it?

Mr. COMER. I do not mean the members of the exchange. Anybody can sell cotton on the exchange, but you have got to have it there to deliver, provided you want it delivered. Most of them do not calculate on delivery.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does some committee on the exchange do the certificating?

Mr. COMER. Oh, no; the Government does. It has to be seven-eighths of an inch staple, a certain color, and so forth. The Government does that. We bought cotton some years ago, 2,000 bales; we paid for the tender in the spring, and it was delivered to us in August. That was the time when they found this indictment against Patton, Haynes, Brown, and others. The total cotton certificated in New York in January was 2,336 bales; in February it was 666 bales; in March, 3,090 bales; in April, 1,584 bales. A total of 7,676 bales certificated for delivery. That was in New York.

I believe you read the other day, Senator, that New Orleans had 20,744 bales.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think you are correct, 20,744 bales.

Mr. COMER. Of which 15,920 are higher grade cotton.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is correct.

Mr. COMER. I want you to keep that right square in your mind.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well.

Mr. COMER. Senator, last week we had 200 bales delivered to us through the New Orleans Exchange. We were carrying quite a bit of cotton. We did not believe they would tender, but they did tender 200 bales, and here is what they delivered. You recollect saying that two-thirds of the cotton down there was high grade. They delivered to us of the 200 bales—there were 210 bales, because of the light weight—strict good middling, 1 bale; good middling, 5 bales; strict middling, 1 bale; middling, 1 bale. That was the high-grade cotton out of that 15,000 bales they delivered. Then strict middling tinges, 3 bales; low middling, 199 bales. That made 210 bales. They gave us 8 bales of high grade, 3 bales of tinges, and 199 bales of the lowest grades. They did not disturb their higher grade cotton.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator please tell us how much difference they allowed him between the values of those low grades they tendered and middling cotton on those dates?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir; and there is where the trouble comes in, too. I am glad you asked the question. I have the comparative differences—New Orleans and New York. I am loaded for bear to-day.

This is from the Bureau of Markets. The exchange difference in New Orleans is now 9 cents between low middling and middling. The difference between middling and low middling in New York is 7.20. There is a difference of 1¾ cents between low middling in New York and low middling in New Orleans. Who ever heard of a condition like that being fair? One and three-quarters cents between the prices, according to this, of New York and New Orleans on low middling. Not only that but worse than that, because New York Exchange middling is a cent higher than New Orleans, which makes 2¾ cents difference; and, Senator, you agree to this amendment and that thing will be impossible, and it ought to be impossible.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. COMER. Anything.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator has not answered my question yet.

Mr. COMER. What is it?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have asked the Senator what difference was allowed him by the company which tendered him these low grades of cotton of which he complains. What was paid him in the way of a difference between middling, the basis of the contract, and the cotton which they actually tendered to him?

Mr. COMER. Senator, I have just told you. I told you 9 cents in New Orleans.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator spoke of just one grade there. He said those were the differences between New Orleans and New York. But he has never yet said whether it was a New York contract or a New Orleans contract, and I can not tell from his statement what they did actually pay him, and whether the difference was a fair one or not. If the Senator received the full amount of money due him, I take it he certainly has no complaint to make. Was the Senator swindled in the transaction?

Was the matter negotiated so that the Senator actually lost money on his contract?

Mr. COMER. When 39.80 was the price in New Orleans, and we got the low middling at 9 cents off, that would make it 30.80 in the New Orleans exchange market for the low middling. That low-middling cotton was worth that price anywhere. The man who put that cotton through the exchange lost money. But that is not the question. It was the basis, which was 39.80, as against a spot price 2 cents higher. If the exchanges had been functioning and the differentials between low middling and middling had been the same, 9 cents, then the seller of the cotton would have gotten 2 cents a pound more and that is wherein the exchange basis price middling operates against the holders of off-grade cotton as compared with a stabilized price middling.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am trying to find out what Senator COMER and his mills lost on the transaction.

Mr. COMER. I have just read that we took 199 bales of low-middling cotton. That was the lowest grade they have. If we were getting it for higher grade mills, we would have had to resell it, because we could not use it. If we were taking it for our low-grade mills, it was cheaper than we could have bought it, as low middling was worth that price or more anywhere. I mean that it had no added value by having come to us through an exchange and had lost money because of the expense of delivery.

Mr. RANSDELL. But how much money did the Senator lose?

Mr. COMER. I do not know. We had bought this contract months before at a price of about 33½ cents. The cotton was closed out at 39.67; we made 6 cents per pound on the hedge sale and got the cotton cheaper than we could have bought it on the market.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator does not know, Mr. President, I am sure I do not.

Mr. COMER. On April 19 strict good middling was quoted 275 points on middling in Memphis, 400 on at New Orleans, 288 on at New York; good middling was 200 points on in Memphis, 350 on in New Orleans, and 223 on in New York; strict middling yellow tinge was quoted 450 off in Memphis, 150 off in New Orleans, 315 off in New York; good middling yellow tinge was quoted 300 off in Memphis, 75 on in New Orleans, and 133 off in New York; and good middling yellow stains was 600 off in Memphis, 300 off in New Orleans, and 450 off in New York. I give these differences to show you that these can not be true quotations; they are fictitious, and yet out of them is composited the basis middling.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if Memphis is an exchange market?

Mr. COMER. Sure.

Mr. RANSDELL. They have not a cotton exchange there, have they?

Mr. COMER. It is one of the markets from which we get prices. I think they have a cotton exchange there; I am sure of it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was not aware of it. I thought there was only one big cotton exchange in the South, at New Orleans, and one at New York—two in the United States. That is my understanding.

Mr. COMER. You are wrong, because we have a letter from the Dallas exchange. Nearly all the big cotton markets have exchanges. But I am quoting you from the spot market, from which New York and New Orleans get their relations.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to be misunderstood. I know they have a spot market in Memphis and these other big cities; but what I meant was that there is no future-contract market exchange in Memphis.

Mr. COMER. I think they have.

Mr. RANSDELL. Perhaps so. I understood the contrary.

Mr. COMER. They have what they call bucket shops.

I have here a telegram from New Orleans sent a few days ago to one of their correspondents in Alabama. It reads:

NEW ORLEANS.

Professional effort being made to depress the market, but offerings absorbed in good fashion. Likely require constant selling to force market down to any considerable amount.

Here is another telegram:

NEW ORLEANS.

Rumored there will be about 10,000 bales of low-grade cotton delivered on May contracts here to-day.

Spots New Orleans reported quiet, if any change likely lower. Not much business so far. Reported movement in New York to close the New York Cotton Exchange on Saturday in the future.

That was dated last week.

You yourself said that they only had 5,000 bales of low-grade cotton there, and yet here is a telegram from New Orleans that they are going to tender 10,000 bales.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to misquote me, I am sure. He says I myself said they only had 5,000 bales. What I said is found on page 6345 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 30th of April, and it speaks for itself. I said that the United States Bureau of Markets showed that cotton classified and certificated from March, 1919, to December 1, 1919, in the New Orleans Exchange market was 20,744 bales, of which 4,824 were low grade. I did not say they did not have a great deal more cotton there. I assume that in that enormous cotton market, which handles hundreds of thousands of bales of spots—and I could not pretend to say how many bales of futures—there are bound to be a good many more than 5,000 bales of low-grade cotton.

Mr. COMER. The way those things are managed largely is to keep them in near-by warehouses, ready to be certificated. Where New York has less than 3,000 bales, I understand that Norfolk has 70,000 bales. Suppose Norfolk was carrying this kind of cotton. That is the way those things are run. In your speech on page 6344 of the RECORD you practically make the spot market run with futures market, both running very nearly the same thing.

And, Senator, that is just exactly what we are after. I want the two to run together. They should run together, and when they do not run together they are not functioning. That is what is the trouble. The New York Exchange market and the spot market in the South have been for the last 60 days very nearly together, the thing we are after; the New York market is functioning properly.

I have here an article which some gentleman sent me, some Senator, I suppose, cut from the New York Commercial of Friday, April 23. This article from the Wall Street Journal I am going to read you says:

Kill this rider.

Mr. RANSDELL. Alluding to your amendment.

Mr. COMER. Yes. "Kill this rider."

What endless litigation is in this vague wording.

The vagueness here charged against the amendment has been eliminated by the amendment already offered.

Then, the impossibility of performance. There are now 2,262 bales of certified cotton in New York—

This is April 1, from the Wall Street Journal—

None is middling fair; 4 bales are strict good middling, 46 good, 146 strict middling, and 477 middling—altogether 27 per cent of the total amount here. But the unhappy seller must deliver 50 per cent of these grades. How easy to create a squeeze!

But the planter will be the chief sufferer—

Those blessed planters, you know, how they do favor them!

because about 40 per cent of his cotton will be outlawed. Cotton, even from the same plantation, is of different lengths, color, and quality. Until interfered with by law, the exchange made all spinnable cotton good for delivery on a contract. Thus the planter had a market for every bale of his cotton that was usable in the mills.

That man, Senators, did not know what he was writing about. He did not understand the first gist of the question at all, and even the Times-Picayune did not understand. They did not understand a single gist of the amendment. I have two letters from parties in Louisiana calling attention to that.

From the New York Commercial I read further:

The sooner Mr. COMER learns that the interests of the cotton merchant and the cotton grower are identical the sooner will he withdraw from any plan which is bound to work great hardships upon growers and merchants alike.

That man does not know what he is talking about.

"The contract market has two purposes," declared C. T. Revere, of Munds, Rogers & Stackpole, in discussing the Comer amendment. "First, it is an outlet for such merchantable and spinnable cotton as may be unsalable at a given time, and, second, it affords price insurance against market fluctuations. Hedge purchases by merchants against sales of the staple to spinners as well as hedge sales by merchants against accumulations afford insurance to be obtained in no other way."

That is from the papers. I want to read a letter from a cotton man, one of the largest in Alabama, straight as a shingle:

SELMA, ALA., April 20, 1920.

Hon. B. B. COMER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to commend you in your effort to amend the law that will give to the cotton trade a just and fair contract on the cotton exchanges.

For years we have longed for a contract that would afford us a reasonable hedge. As you are aware, spot cotton is frequently offered for sale when buyers can not in turn make an actual sale; under such circumstances we as buyers would be glad to buy the cotton if we could get a hedge on the cotton exchanges that would be reasonably safe. Thus you will see the benefit that would arise in favor of the producer. He could always find a purchaser for his cotton. With conditions as have prevailed during the near past how could a buyer buy spots at, say, 40 cents and sell a future contract as a hedge at a discount of something like $25 a bale?

If we can be of any service to you, do not hesitate to call on us.

Yours, very truly,

W. P. WELCH & CO.

There is a spot man; I mean a man of actual business, a man who comes in contact with it every day, who says it is a great help to him in the business. He says it will help every farmer he comes in contact with. He can go ahead and sell anything and hedge; he can go ahead and buy and hedge, and his statements are all straight, and show business ability and comprehension of the subject.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COMER. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is that gentleman to whom you have just alluded a cotton producer?

Mr. COMER. I do not know.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator does not know whether he is raising cotton or not?

Mr. COMER. No.

Mr. RANSDELL. So far as the Senator knows, he may be a spinner?

Mr. COMER. No; he is not a spinner.

Mr. RANSDELL. He may be a dealer in cotton?

Mr. COMER. He is a dealer in cotton.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have in my hand, if the Senator will permit me to read it, a letter, dated April 22, from President J. A. Whitehurst, of the State Board of Agriculture of Oklahoma——

Mr. COMER. Read it in your own time to-morrow.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well. I will not interfere with the Senator.

Mr. COMER. Here is a man that we buy thousands of bales of cotton from:

SELMA, ALA., April 6, 1920.

Hon. B. B. COMER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Have wired petition to Hon. E. D. SMITH and GORDON LEE signed by prominent farmers, bankers, and merchants urging passage of the Comer cotton bill. Hope you will succeed in passing this meritorious bill, as it will, no doubt, be of great benefit to the producer and consumer and put the future trading on a more legitimate basis.

MORRIS HOHENBERG.

That is from way down in southern Alabama.

I am not printing all these in the RECORD. Here is a telegram I have to-day:

WAYCROSS, GA., May 1, 1920.

Senator B. B. COMER,
Washington, D. C.:

The Ware County Farmers' Union, in session, with the Satilla, Pine Grove, Mount Green, Waresboro, Lynn locals represented, indorses the Comer amendment and urges its enactment into law.

L. C. WALKER, President.
J. M. SOLOMON, Secretary.

I want to read this from the New York Commercial. This man says:

It is a spinners' bill—

He is a member of the cotton exchange—for the benefit of the spinners, and that benefit will accrue at the expense of the man who grows cotton.

To appreciate how much of a spinners' bill this is it should be understood that low-grade cotton is far more expensive to make into fabric than is the high-grade staple.

This is the story:

Labor in the mills is largely on piecework basis. A worker can not handle low-grade material so rapidly as he can the high grade, consequently there is dissatisfaction among the workers when too large a percentage of the staple is of the lower grades. As the workers' output and pay is reduced by the low grades so the output of the mill is reduced.

That gives a very clear statement of why the mills are demanding and buying at the higher prices the high grades, and not demanding and buying at the lower prices the low grades. That is a very clear statement of it. I could not have done it better, and this is from a man who is writing against the amendment.

Under these conditions it at once becomes clear—

Of course it is clear—

why the spinner wants high-grade cotton, particularly at the present, when the demand for strictly high-grade cloths is larger than ever. The Comer amendment would make for just this condition which the spinners want. It would force the delivery of high-grade raw materials to the tremendous disadvantage of the grower whose crop can not be all strictly high grade.

That latter part is just immaculate nonsense, and I am sorry he did not know it. The high grade is made by the demand for it and the low grade is made by the demand for it, and this does not add one picayune to it either way, and the man who asserts it, as I said this afternoon, should have his head examined.

He says this about me:

He sends out telegrams about a mythical order for 5,000,000 bales of cotton from Europe waiting to be placed, if the cotton can be had, and tells the growers they can get 60 cents a pound for their cotton.

I never was accused of that before. I would never say to anybody that you could send your cotton anywhere and get more than the market price for it. When you talk about sending 5,000,000 bales of low-grade cotton anywhere, it will be done at great risk. It is the market that makes the price.

Spinners are going to send representives where? To Europe. For what purpose? To see the spinners to sell this cotton or any other cotton at the market price.

I want to call attention to this article again:

Reverting to the Comer amendment, I want to call your attention particularly to the fact that of the last crop 57 per cent was graded middling or above—

Fifty-seven per cent, and yet they have balked like the mischief when I said the average of cotton was two-thirds of the crop above, and this says that of the last crop 57 per cent was graded middling or above, and then says—leaving 43 per cent which could not be delivered on contract. Who would take it? That is a question which the southern cotton grower must answer.

There is an everlasting answer to that. Supply and demand will take care of it just like it always has and always will do, and if every bale of it was tenderable through the exchanges it would not facilitate the sale or value a cent, and any assertion to the contrary of this would make the exchanges capable of making a fiat price on cotton.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator what is going to happen to the low-grade cotton of the South—and he admits there is a great amount of it in the South now—if his amendment is adopted? What is going to happen to all these low grades, and will they not lose their availability as an insurance for the seller and their potentiality for hedging purposes? I would like to have the Senator from Alabama explain exactly the effect of his amendment on the producer's low-grade cotton, which makes up such a large portion of his crop.

Mr. COMER. The stabilizing of the contract price making it approximate the spot price will unquestionably advance the contract price, and if the same parity between the lower grades will continue, then the lower grades to that extent will be benefited and they will also be benefited to the extent that the market reflects solvent, trustworthy business conditions.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator whether he thinks that we ought to repeal the cotton-futures law entirely?

Mr. COMER. No.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator believe the exchanges, properly handled, exercise a good function and one valuable to commerce and business generally?

Mr. COMER. Not only that, but I believe they will be a benefit when you make them straight and honest, when you get a business that is straight, that dealers will go there and do business more so than they will do to-day. I believe it will increase business.

Mr. RANSDELL. But the Senator thinks that men like our friend ex-Senator Percy, Mr. A. B. Learned, W. B. Thompson, and others, whom I quoted extensively, are mistaken when they say the law is functioning very well? Does the Senator think it will be very much of a benefit to the entire cotton trade if the amendment which he has proposed is adopted?

Mr. COMER. When you get back to Senator Percy, I want to explain what I said about gambling a while ago. Senator Percy is one of the nicest men I ever saw and I am very fond of him. He is not a gambler, you understand, not by any manner of means.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am very glad to have the Senator withdraw that statement. I knew that Le Roy Percy was no gambler.

Mr. COMER. Oh, no; he is no gambler; and no doubt Mr. Thompson is a nice man.

Mr. RANSDELL. He certainly is.

Mr. COMER. But when Mr. Thompson says that the present law is good, I have just shown you where it is not good.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is a difference of opinion.

Mr. COMER. There is no difference of opinion about it. I have shown you the statistics about it; I have shown you quotations themselves, and any business which makes that record, I do not care where it is, is wrong. You can not make that kind of a record and do a straight business. I read it to you a while ago. Mark you, Senator Percy was held up to the Senate as being a very smart man, and he is; but Senator Percy himself says that if this amendment goes into effect it will not have that deleterious and far-reaching effect in the exchanges that you say it will, and he is telling the truth.

Mr. RANSDELL. I believe the Senator admits that practically one-half of all the cotton is low grade, does he not?

Mr. COMER. The New York Wall Street Journal said 47 per cent was low grade last year. I say that the usual year more than two-thirds of the cotton is middling and above. Last year the New York Journal said 47 per cent was low grade.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have always understood middling was, as its name indicates, the basis of the grades; that is, one-half in round numbers were above and one-half in round numbers below. However that may be, 47 per cent of the present crop, according to those figures of the New York Journal of Commerce, is low grade. The Senator will admit that is a very large percentage of the crop, and under his amendment, as I take it, all of that is abandoned—that is, left out and is not considered at all. There can be no insurance for all of that low grade, for that 47 per cent of a crop which is worth $2,000,000,000. What has the Senator to say to that?

Mr. COMER. There is not any insured price for anything; there is nothing insured. The supply and demand market controls everything—low grade and all—and when you say the exchange insures anything, it is not an accurate statement.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then, may I ask the Senator what is the function of the exchange if it be not to hedge cotton or to insure the cotton?

Mr. COMER. The function of the exchange is to make a true index of the value of cotton; that is what it is for. It is not to make the price; it is not to increase the price; it is to be the true index of cotton; that is what it is for.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then, the Senator differs from Mr. Herbert Knox Smith. That gentleman, in a wonderfully interesting, elucidative, and exhaustive report made in 1908 as commissioner of corporations, recommended most emphatically that the exchanges were necessary because of their insurance guaranty, and the congressional committee which studied the question fundamentally and scientifically concurred in this recommendation. These capable and disinterested authorities assert they are essential to the trade.

The Senator seems to disagree with them. I showed here several days ago that the House Committee on Agriculture, in an able report, No. 765, of the Sixty-third Congress, spoke very highly of the cotton contract. It is not necessary to read it again, I imagine, and I merely quote from the report:

> It is the opinion of the committee that the abolition of the cotton exchanges would result inevitably in the monopolizing of the entire cotton crop into the hands of a very few powerful interests, with the force and means to fix the price at which the farmer would be compelled to sell his cotton. Fully 75 per cent of American-produced cotton leaves the hands of the producer during the four months of September, October, November, and December. It takes no stretch of the imagination to foresee how utterly helpless the farmer, as a class, would be in his present disorganized condition as a factor in fixing the price of his own products as against the organized genius and money of the spinners and powerful spot-cotton dealers.

As against the men who, according to the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record, made in the State of South Carolina last year over 300 per cent; as against the men who, in the opinion of the great cotton convention of the American Cotton Association, held in the city of Montgomery, the capital city of the Senator's own State, three weeks ago, said that cotton could well bring 60 cents a pound at the present time, in view of the profits which the spinners were making on it.

This is not what I say; this is not what an exchange in New York or an exchange in New Orleans says; it is what the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives said when they had the Smith-Lever bill before them. They show, in substance, that if it were not for the exchanges, if it were not for the insuring feature, if it were not for the hedging which comes about on the exchanges in the great markets, if it were not, if you please, for the speculation indulged in by the great number of men in this country who like to speculate, the producers would be at the mercy of the spinners and the large spot-cotton dealers.

There is a big difference of opinion, I say to the Senator from Alabama and to other Senators, on this great question, and I should like to have the Senator from Alabama explain, when he says that these things are all wrong, how he knows that the members of the great Agricultural Committee of the House were mistaken, how he knows that Mr. Herbert Knox Smith was wrong—and Mr. Smith is not a cotton man; he has no interest in cotton—and how the Senator knows that men like Mr. Percy and Mr. Thompson and all the others are wrong. Mr. President, I desire to quote just an excerpt from Mr. Smith's report—Chapter I, page 58—to wit:

> It should be emphasized that one of the great functions of a cotton exchange is the bringing together of buyers and sellers or their representatives. An exchange is a great market place. Transactions are, of course, greatly facilitated by the mere congregation of buyers and sellers and their representatives on the floor of an exchange. In the case of those exchanges on which a future business is conducted it should be noted that there are really two markets, one for future contracts and the other for spot cotton. The future market is not used to bring the producer and the spinner directly together but is rather a meeting place for cotton merchants (or their representatives) and brokers, who stand between the producer and the spinner. Spinners, for reasons explained in detail in a later part, do not ordinarily receive their supplies of cotton directly on exchange contracts but enter into private arrangements with merchants or brokers for the particular kinds of cotton which they require. These merchants, moreover, ordinarily do not obtain the cotton which they need by receiving it on exchange contracts. Such merchants, as already emphasized, use the future market mainly for hedging purposes, and the future ring to this extent becomes, as already pointed out, a great clearing house for hedging transactions. * * * The enormous advantage of such hedging transactions to the spot merchant, however, has been fully illustrated, so that it should be apparent that the future market, while not designed to bring the final consumer into direct touch with the producer of cotton, may perform quite as legitimate a function as if it accomplished this result directly.
> Of course, in addition to hedging transactions, a vast volume of speculative business is conducted in contracts. These, however, as just pointed out, are closely intertwined with hedging operations and may greatly facilitate the latter, although at times they undoubtedly are a source of disturbance.

Senators, a dogmatic assertion is one thing but proof is another.

Mr. COMER. I thoroughly indorse what Mr. Herbert Knox Smith has said; I quoted page after page from him, and would have quoted indefinitely had it not been for the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who was anxious to proceed with some bill which he had in charge. I turned the book containing the statement of Mr. Smith over to the Senator from Texas to read. It is one of the most interesting and one of the straightest stories I have even seen; and if the Senator from Louisiana will read it, he will see that what I have been contending for is based in large degree upon the result of Mr. Smith's investigation. It is not the cotton exchanges we are fighting; we want the cotton exchanges; but we want them to function properly. When the exchanges function properly, then they are just as necessary as is any other part of the business. Their proper functioning, as Mr. Welch says, is this: If a man can go on the market and buy a thousand bales of cotton which he has not sold, and then can go and sell a thousand bales on contracts and have them carried through on the basis of the market, and not on the basis of the contracts, then they accomplish their purpose and function. We are not fighting against the exchanges; we are fighting against the improper practices of the exchanges. When they practice what is right, when they function properly, then they are of great use to the country.

In reference to profits, those of you who listened to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in his discussion of the dye-products bill, and those of you who go abroad in the land, anywhere and everywhere, will realize that America is not idle. I dare say that nine-tenths of the business of the country is doing well. How do you think the people could pay the taxes if they were not? It is a good thing the country is doing well along that line; but do not any of you ever get the idea that I am decrying the exchanges, for I am not; it is the evil practices of the exchanges that I am trying to correct. The amendment I have proposed, if carried through, will correct those evils. It will very nearly produce a condition, in my opinion—and that is what they fear—where the exchange price will coordinate with the spot price; and, if it does, then the exchange will gain and not lose business, and it will give every business man the opportunity to take care of his business as everyone wants it taken care of.

When farmers talk about the cotton exchanges now they say that the prices fixed are paper prices. In Alabama we have a ticker law which prohibits bucket shops because of the great losses of the people who went in and watched the ticker.

I will inquire of the Senator from Louisiana if he desires to ask me any other question?

Mr. RANSDELL. No.

Mr. COMER. I wish to thank the Senate for their courtesy; and I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that I have tried to be just as courteous to him as I could.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator certainly has been.

Mr. COMER. And I have tried to be as fair to him as he has been to me.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have no complaint at all.

Mr. COMER. I yield the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I merely wish to put into the RECORD one or two telegrams. I read first a very brief telegram from the Hon. I. N. McCollister, president of the Louisiana Farmers' Union. I have had it for some time; it is dated the 28th of March last, and addressed to me at Lake Providence, when I was at my home there. He says:

MANY, LA., March 28, 1920.

J. E. RANSDELL,
United States Senator, Lake Providence, La.:

Kill the Comer rider to the Agriculture appropriation bill, as it outlaws the majority of the cotton raised by farmers and destroys price insurance by futures.

I. N. MCCOLLISTER,
President Louisiana Farmers' Union.

Mr. McCollister lives at Many, La.; he is a farmer and lives in the hill section of north Louisiana, where he raises cotton.

I now read a telegram from Mr. H. Arthur Morgan, secretary-treasurer of the Association of State Farmers' Union Presidents. He is a farmer, living at Gonzales, La., and raises cotton and some cattle. His telegram is dated March 30, and he says:

GONZALES, LA., March 30, 1920.

Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
Washington, D. C.:

The rider to the Agriculture appropriation bill by COMER if permitted to become law would so restrict the contract as to be a vital blow to its usefulness to the producers, sellers, and buyers of American cotton. Briefly, the Comer rider is in the interest of the cotton spinner and opposed to the cotton producers, and if incorporated in the law would mean a deathblow to the cotton producers. I hope you will do all in your power to eliminate this Comer rider entirely. The passage of the Comer rider would place the American farmer at the mercy of the American spinners and foreign manufacturers, as they would control the price of American cotton.

H. ARTHUR MORGAN,
Secretary-Treasurer Association State Farmers' Union Presidents.

Mr. Morgan, as I have said, is a cotton grower and cattleman. He is a member of the Louisiana Legislature and lives not far from the city of Baton Rouge, the capital of the State.

I now wish to read a copy of a letter which has been furnished me from Mr. J. A. Whitehurst, president of the State board of agriculture, Oklahoma city, Okla. The letter is dated April 28, is addressed to Hon. C. S. Barrett, president of the National Farmers' Union, Atlanta, Ga., and reads as follows:

STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE,
Oklahoma city, April 27, 1920.

Hon. C. S. BARRETT,
President National Farmers' Union,
Atlanta, Ga.

MY DEAR SIR: I see that Mr. COMER refers to you in his rider to the Agricultural bill on cotton grades as being favorable to his proposition.

I am certainly very much surprised to know that you take this position, in which the spinners are so earnestly interested. I am sure that not only the majority but all of the farmers in the entire Southwest, where they are not influenced more or less by the spinners and dependent upon export markets for their cotton, are opposed to the Comer rider.

I am surprised at this time, when we are all trying to get together through the American Cotton Association to protect the interest of the farmer, to find such a division of opinion existing in the Atlantic States and the Southwest. I have been more surprised at the stand that Mr. Wannamaker has taken, professing such deep interest in behalf of the cotton farmer, and I feel that this move will have much to do with destroying any concrete movement on the part of the Southern States getting together in the American Cotton Association.

We are to have a State-wide meeting at the Capitol in Oklahoma city May 10 and 11, at which time we will make up our minds whether we will go ahead in the cotton business separate and independent from the Southeast States or not.

Assuring you again of the resentment felt by the cotton farmers of Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, and Arkansas, I am,

Very truly, yours,

J. A. WHITEHURST, President.

Just one word more, Mr. President. I wish to reiterate what I said several days ago, that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, if written into law, will change a statute which was enacted by Congress in 1914 after the most earnest and sincere consideration, not for days, but for months and for years, for that measure was before Congress for several years. It is known as the Smith-Lever Cotton Futures Act. Under that act, passed in 1914, the exchanges of this country have been carrying on business since its adoption. It was amended slightly last year and restricted somewhat; the grades of "good ordinary" and "strict good ordinary" were taken out of the contract and the lowest limit was placed at "low middling."

Mr. COMER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. RANSDELL. Just a moment; let me make this statement. I think the fair and the just thing to do is to bring this matter up before the committees of Congress, and give the cotton producers and the cotton spinners and the cotton exchanges, the three great interests involved, a chance to be heard. Practically only one side was heard when this measure came up—the spinners, most ably represented by the Senator from Alabama, who has told us here to-day that he and his companies have 200,000 spindles, eight big mills, in the State of Alabama. One side was represented here, Senators. Let us have this measure presented to a special committee, if you will, or to the Agricultural Committee, to Congress in a fair, open manner; not moved for the first time on the floor of the Senate, when we are not expecting it, and changing the entire law on such a valuable product as cotton.

Of the present supply, an unduly large portion is of low-grade cotton, because of the delay in gathering last fall on account of the shortage of labor and the consequent weather injury. Obviously the immediate effect of the Comer amendment will be to upset dealings in cotton which require hedging, because a man will hesitate to sell a hedge under which he may be required to deliver more cotton above the grade of middling than he may possibly be able to command. At the same time the buyers of the large ratio of low-grade cottons still to be sold will be enabled to hammer the price upon the contention that such cottons will not be tenderable on contract. In the present situation, under the Comer amendment, it is a very reckless man who would agree to deliver, say, in September, any large volume of white middling cotton except at a price far beyond the present quotations. At the same time, a man would be equally as reckless who would agree, under that amendment, to purchase for September delivery cotton below middling at present quotations, if such cotton should be denied the privilege of tender on contract. The result to be reasonably expected from the Comer amendment is an artificial enhancement of the price of cotton above middling, and a corresponding depreciation of the price of cotton below middling.

All I ask, Mr. President, as a representative of the producers and also of the cotton exchange of my State—for I speak for it as well—is that the matter be delayed until we can study it, just as we studied the original Smith-Lever bill, and as we studied the amendment which was adopted last year. The proposed amendment goes much further and narrows and restricts the future contract far greater than the change made in 1919. .

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. COMER. In explanation of this amendment, I will say that two years ago a very extensive hearing was held on the conduct of the exchanges. Resulting from that, a very long discussion and investigation was held, and as a result of that the first Smith-Lever bill was passed, carrying 21 grades. The usufruct of that law did not bring the results that the makers of the bill and the people of the cotton States thought it would, and this amendment was passed; and while I am on that subject I want to tell you exactly how the amendment was passed.

It was proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] as a rider on the wheat-guaranty bill, just exactly like this was, and carried 7 grades. In the conference committee the number was changed from 7 to 10, and accepted by both sides, and it was passed. There was no examination nor anything else had at all and but very brief debate. It was passed before anybody knew it, and passed on the knowledge they had gotten from the examination of three years before.

This amendment was offered exactly like that was, with the same intent, and that was to get a reliable, safe, commercial, stabilized delivery. That was the whole intent of it, and it was the intent of the first one. The intent of this is simply to make the amendment of last year function, that is all.

You say that the subject should be gone into on a lengthy examination. Senator, I have said from the beginning that this amendment did not go as far as it ought to go. In talking with one of the Members of the House of Representatives who is on the committee, he suggested that there should be only three grades—middling, strict middling, and good middling. If this amendment fails I am going to try to have introduced somewhere, either here or in the House, a bill to make it but four grades—strict low middling, middling, strict middling, and good middling—and that will not hurt low-grade cotton. It does not "inlaw" or "outlaw" anything. It simply places the exchange on a basis where it will be an insurance on spot values, that is all.

I trust that this amendment will pass as it is. If it does not pass, and an investigation is held, I am going to go before it myself and fight for what? A more restrictive bill, because you want an exchange that will function. You can not drag all grades of cotton through an exchange or anywhere else, and you can not make the value there or anywhere else. You have got to make it on the markets of the world. The fact that we put one on here does not affect the price of cotton—I mean, it does not affect the price of that cotton. They can teeter the exchange price but they can not teeter the spot price. I am obliged to you.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 6, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of London, England, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pause in Thy presence, remembering that Thou art all wise. We seek Thy wisdom. We thank Thee that the foundation of Thy throne is ever that of justice. Teach us to walk in the ways of justice. We bless Thee that we remember that Thy heart is the heart of infinite and unfathomable compassion. Grant unto us that all our doings may be inspired with love in response to Thy love. This day guide in the deliberation of those upon whom Thou hast set the high responsibility of leading a great people in the way of truth, honor, justice, and mercy. Hear us as we thus present our petition to Thee and grant us the answers of Thy wisdom and Thy love. We ask it in the name of our Lord and King. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13870, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] pending when the committee rose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 3, amend by striking out the figures $2,357,000 and inserting in lieu thereof $2,569,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I find that in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing there are about 2,100 employees classed as operatives. The number varies slightly from time to time. These employees do all the work toward the preparing, examining, trimming, inspecting, counting, perforating, and assorting of all the money, bonds, and postage stamps used in this country. They take the material from the time it comes from the printer and do all this until it is a finished product. These people do a class of work that requires skill and the greatest kind of concentration and attention. I do not believe there is a class of employees in the Government service whose work is as concentrated as the work of these employees. They are placed on tasks that require them to work every minute of time from 8 in the morning until 4 in the afternoon. They are not allowed to leave the building during that time. I am told that at least 50 per cent of them have dependents, and yet these people are paid, on the average, $720 to $800 a year, or $2.50 a day. I do not see how they can live on it. They do a class of work that requires skill and attention; and not only that, they are doing a class of work that requires responsibility. These people handle all the currency, bonds, and stamps of this Government; they are held responsible for every piece of paper that comes into their possession.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it not a fact that they handle such paper that a slight mistake will cause great loss to the Government?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is true. I have watched these people work. I have seen women handling six to eight thousand sheets of paper a day, putting them through the trimming and perforating machines, and they have to bring each sheet on the side and the end to a needle point. They wear shades over their eyes, and they tell me that their eyes frequently give out. When you pass by their desks they do not look up.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman realize that the distinguished chairman of this committee handles $500,000,000 here——

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And he gets reasonable pay.

Mr. BLANTON. If you compare the pay of these employees and the amount of money that is handled, the gentleman will see that they are not so very far apart.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Oh, the argument of the gentleman is utterly ridiculous. The only thing that this amendment does is to bring the standard of pay of these employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing up to the same standard that we are paying in the Printing Office. The employees there get $2.80 per day, and I do not see how they live on that. Certainly these employees ought to get equal pay with the other bureau, because they have more difficult work, they have to handle more valuable property, and they are responsible for every piece of paper. These employees, 50 per cent of them, have dependents. They get from $720 to $800 a year, or $2.50 a day.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will show me 100 clerks down there—yes, if he will show me 15 clerks down there who get less than $3.13 a day, I will agree to his amendment. There is not a person down there but what gets $3.13, according to the statement of the director of the bureau.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is unfortunate, because either the gentleman from Iowa is in error or the director of the bureau this morning stated a falsehood to me. I went over these figures with the director, and he tells me that the calculation I have made will bring the pay of these employees up to what is paid to the employees of the Printing Office.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman ought to have read the hearings. If he does he will find that the most of these employees are getting over $3.45. With the bonus they all get at least $3.13.

Mr. ROMJUE. They are receiving only $2.37 a day, and the bonus brings them to $3.13.

Mr. GOOD. And the bonus is prescribed by law as an additional compensation.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I am talking about the basic pay.

Mr. GOOD. I am talking about the pay; I do not care whether it is received in one envelope or two envelopes. When the gentleman says they are not receiving $3.13 he is mistaken. The fact is that they receive $3.13 as the lowest pay. When the director made his estimate he frankly said that he made it in that way, because he did not know whether Congress would give the bonus or not. We have already carried the bonus for the next year. So we are giving them with this provision a minimum of $3.13 a day, and most of them get over $3.50 a day.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. With the bonus you are paying them between $900 and $1,000 a year, are you not?

Mr. GOOD. There are different rates of pay. One hundred and forty-six get $3.13 a day, 15 get $3.18 a day, 122 get $3.26, 48 get $3.32, 468 get $3.38 a day, 227 get $3.45 a day, and they range from that up to $3.76 and $3.80 a day.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Is there any reason why these employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing should not be paid equal compensation with the employees in the Public Printing Office?

Mr. GOOD. Is there any reason why we should take out of the pockets of the taxpayers money to pay these girls that are doing this work twice as much as the gentleman would pay a girl to work about 12 hours a day in his kitchen?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Does the gentleman deny that the employees in every hotel and restaurant in this town are not getting as much as these girls are?

Mr. GOOD. I will give the gentleman the minimum wage.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. It is $16 a week.

Mr. GOOD. And there is not one here who is not getting more than $18 a week.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I beg to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, is this a privileged matter, or how does it come up?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has offered an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask recognition against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] rose, and the Chair will recognize him first.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield first to me, so that I may see whether or not we can have an agreement on time for debate on amendments to this paragraph?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the point of order has been reserved.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order. Let us first dispose of the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to get a little information in regard to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask the chairman a question or two about the point of order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to find out from the chairman whether or not these salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would not make any difference if they were.

Mr. GOOD. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to fix them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to the point of order, and I withdraw it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 20 minutes, 5 minutes of that time to go to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and 5 minutes to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes, to be divided in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLER. I object.

Mr. GOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be limited to 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that all debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment should be adopted. In addition to what the distinguished chairman of the committee has said, you will find, on page 216 of the hearings, that of those who are receiving a base pay with a bonus there are only eight who receive $3.80 per day and only two who receive $3.50 a day, so that it will be seen that only a very small number receive that base pay with the bonus which would correspond at all with the pay of those who are working in the Printing Office. On page 217 the director says that, considering the rigid responsibility in which these employees are held, due to the very character and nature of their work, he thinks they are underpaid in comparison with other branches of the public service here in Washington. That is the statement of the director in charge of these employees. The record shows, on the pages referred to, that the employees in the Printing Office, who do work of no higher character, work that does not require such a high technical knowledge, of no more experience, receive the same amount that the employees of this bureau would receive if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri should be agreed to. Why should we provide for four or five thousand employees in the Printing Office at a certain pay, which is fairly commensurate to the employment in which they are engaged, and just across the Mall, where we have 4,000 high-class, competent women doing work that requires a higher degree of technical experience, people who are held responsible for all the material placed in their hands, we should compel them to work at a lower price than is paid for similar work in the Printing Office?

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand that the employees in the Government Printing Office receive a bonus?

Mr. RAKER. They receive a bonus, and their pay is what the pay of these people would be if this amendment were agreed to. There can not be any distinction drawn, there should not be any distinction drawn, and to say that we are extravagant is unfounded. This is the highest technical work in the Government of that class. It is work that the Government needs, it is work that requires careful attention, and it is not work that you can do away with.

The women employees of the bureau work altogether on securities of the United States Government, and each one is personally responsible for every bond, stamp, note, coupon, and so forth, that passes through her hands. From the time the blank paper is first drawn from stock until it becomes a finished security, each person handling it must pay face value for any sheet or part of sheet that is missing at the end of the day. The women examiners who make the final count of Federal currency must make good any shortages reported by the banks. On the other hand, the women employees of the Government Printing Office engaged in the printing of books, pamphlets, and so forth, and who do not have the responsibility that these girls do, receive an entrance wage of $2.80 a day compared with the employees in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving rate of $2.37. These rates are exclusive of the temporary bonus.

You may say we have too many employees. We are paying a large sum of money for this work, but the work is necessary for the functioning of the Government. We must have this work that is turned out by these people in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and it is an injustice to them, it is unfair to them, that they should not be given the same pay as others in the service here in Washington are receiving, and we are not criticizing anyone. Far be it from me to criticize the members of the Committee on Appropriations or any of them, but here is a matter that is in the hands of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and the House, where the matter has been fully presented to them, where a question of injustice is being done. Private employers pay the persons whom they employ higher wages than this. The work must be done; you can not curtail it. I feel sure the House will agree that the wages of these 4,000 low-paid women employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing ought not be less than the wages paid the women employees of the Government Printing Office, when we find that such pay is not too large. I am for this amendment and trust the committee will agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] is a little inaccurate in having us believe that there are any employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing receiving as low as $2.37 a day. He should not merely take what is known as the base pay and cling to that only. As a matter of fact, they are getting not only that basic pay but an additional $240 bonus also, which every employee receiving less than $2,500 a year receives, paid proportionately every two weeks in his envelope. Now, this same table, found on page 216 of the hearings, shows the following: There are 468 employees receiving $3.38 a day; there are 227 employees receiving $3.45 a day; there are 27 employees receiving $3.51 a day; there are 136 employees receiving $3.64 a day; there are 20 employees receiving $3.60 a day; there are 6 employees receiving $3.80 a day; there are 38 employees receiving $3.32 a day; there are 181 employees receiving $3.51 a day; there are 84 employees receiving $3.64 a day; there are 59 employees receiving $3.76 a day; and there are 8 employees receiving $3.80 a day. All of these are unskilled employees.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Are these employees entitled to 30 days' leave of absence with full pay, and in addition entitled to 30 days' sick leave in addition to a half Saturday?

Mr. BLANTON. No one knows that better than the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, who has had these questions before him for the last 40 years. Not all of them, as the gentleman from Missouri would have us believe, are heads of families. Most of them are unskilled, young, inexperienced girls. If the gentleman will go down and watch the employees work, he will see that many of them are young, inexperienced girls who could not get that much salary in the gentleman's district in Missouri. As said by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, they get 30 days' leave each year, vacation on full pay, and in addition to that I feel sure they come within the class who get 30 days' sick leave additional on a doctor's certificate, and you will find some doctors in the District of Columbia who make a living in making certificates for this extra 30 days' sick leave as well as for intoxicating liquors. Not only that but they get a half holiday every Saturday in the three summer months; not only that but they get the 52 Sunday holidays; not only that but they get all the national holidays we get in various parts of the United States, and in addition to that they get a holiday on the numerous special occasions which happen so frequently in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CANNON. And will they go on the retired list at a certain age as soon as the bill which passed the House the other day becomes a law?

Mr. BLANTON. In the law passed, not by the vote of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois or myself, but passed by this House and the Senate, they will go on the retired list when they get to be 65 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Delaware that the time has been limited by the committee.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion for any Member of Congress to throw a fit over the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON]. My friend from Texas gets unduly excited, and in getting thus excited he runs away from the facts. I am informed that these girls affected by this amendment do not receive the 30 days' leave of absence to which the gentleman referred. It is true that they get 30 days' sick leave, but so does everybody else on the Government pay roll.

The chairman of the Appropriations Committee will substantiate the statement that I now make that I have tried to support my colleagues on the subcommittee which prepared this sundry civil bill on practically the entire bill. There are but two or three items on which I have reserved my right to disagree with the majority of that subcommittee. The chairman will recall that I was interested in this proposition suggested by the gentleman from Missouri when we were considering this bill in committee. Why waste the time of this Congress and get so unduly excited over what I might term a most Christian amendment? Let us pass it now.

The women and girls in this bureau who will be benefited by this amendment work altogether on securities of the United States Government, and each of these employees is personally responsible for every bond, stamp, note, coupon, and so forth, that passes through her hands. From the time the blank paper is first drawn from stock until it becomes a finished security, each person handling it must pay face value for any sheet or part of sheet that is missing at the end of the day. The women examiners who make the final count of Federal currency must make good any shortages reported by the banks.

On the other hand, the women employees of the Government Printing Office engaged in the printing of books and pamphlets and reports of committees, and who do not have the responsibility that the women and girls in whose behalf the present amendment is offered, receive an entrance wage of $2.80 a day, compared with a rate received by the latter class of $2.37 a day. Does not this House believe that a job carrying with it the responsibility that these women and girls have on their shoulders ought to carry a higher rate of wages? The chairman of the Appropriations Committee laid certain information before the subcommittee considering this bill which I do not believe was well founded. Because of that information the committee agreed that perhaps just now it would not be well to raise these wages.

I am heart and soul in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. LAYTON. And there is no information before this House that there are a large number of physicians in the District of Columbia who make a living falsifying and forging sick certificates.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Of course there is not, and no one believes that any such practice exists among the physicians of Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, my time has not yet expired. I have not finished. I know how hard this committee has had to work, and no man in the House ought to have the sympathy of his colleagues in any greater degree than the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], our chairman. He has worked from morning until midnight on this bill, and he has done a remarkable job. Yet, as I said in opening, I dislike to see a simple proposition such as is contained in this amendment excite any Member of this House—even the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who seems to get excited about everything nowadays. For the life of me I can not see how these women and girls exist on the niggardly allowance they receive, and I ask the House to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON]. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For the purpose of discussing the amendment and supporting it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been limited, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is only one of the many demands made upon the committee to increase the wages of Government employees. The committee felt that inasmuch as the reclassification committee had recently made its report, and that action would likely be taken by Congress along the line of fixing the pay of Government employees, it was not within the province of this committee to invade that field at all. Now, the gentleman said that these employees do not receive the 30 days' leave. All I know about it is the testimony and the statement of the director who has charge of this bureau. I asked him these questions, as shown on page 217 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. What leave do they have?
Mr. WILMOT. Thirty days in the year, but no sick leave.
The CHAIRMAN. They have holidays in addition to that?
Mr. WILMOT. Yes, sir. There are, counting the 14 half holidays, 13 or 14 holidays.

These girls, all of them, have about 43 or 44 days of leave with pay every year. Now, the gentleman says they are paid at a smaller rate than other employees in the District. Let us see whether they are paid a smaller rate. The minimum that the Secretary can allow them is $3.13 a day. The wages as established in the District of Columbia by the minimum-wage board of the District are as follows: For printing trades—and that is comparable to the work that these girls are doing—$15.50 minimum, or $2.58 a day, as compared with the Government wage for the same class of work of $3.13 as a minimum wage. In the mercantile trades the minimum-wage board has fixed the rate at $16.50 a week or $2.75 a day. For hotels and restaurants, the class of workmen the gentleman from Missouri classes these people with, they receive $16.50 a week, or $2.75 a day, as compared with a minimum wage here of $3.13.

But that is not all. The committee has given enough money here, with an estimate of the reduction in work, of more than 10 per cent as compared with the present year, and the reduction will be more than 10 per cent. My own opinion is that there will be money enough appropriated by this act so that if the director and the Secretary of the Treasury desire they can raise the pay of this class of employees so that no person will receive less than $3.50 a day or even more. This amendment would be making an appropriation in the dark and not in the face of all the facts. The gentleman who has made the motion and the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of it have shown by their statements that they do not know the conditions that surround these employees and did not know the wages received or the leave with pay or the other conditions of employment. They do not know what the minimum-wage board has fixed as a minimum wage for other employees. They do not know the splendid surroundings——

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not yield.

They do not know the splendid surroundings in which these girls work. Why, there is not a finer factory building in all the world than the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is a modern plant, with modern rest room, and with modern facilities, and most moderate prices for the lunches for those who buy their lunches there. And those who desire to take their lunches there have every convenience not afforded by the ordinary printing office.

I think the committee has acted very liberally with these persons, and I deplore the fact that gentlemen get excited because somebody from home, representing some organization, sends a telegram to his Member of Congress to vote for this amendment. That is the poorest of excuses for any man to act upon. That is the poorest excuse for anybody to vote money out of the Public Treasury. It seems to me that the committee in reporting this estimate, if it has been in error at all, has been on the side of liberality in the appropriation. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of plate printers, at piece rates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the rates usually paid for such work, including the wages of printers' assistants, when employed, $1,905,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denominations than those that may be canceled or retired, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act to define and to fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes, approved March 14, 1900: Provided further, That no part of this sum shall be used to increase the wages of plate printers until all printers' assistants receive not less than $2.37 per day.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri offers the following amendment: Amend by striking out the figures "$1,905,000" after the word "employed" on line 17 of page 18, and by inserting in lieu thereof "$2,023,125."

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the other amendment I offered was with respect to operatives in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. There are about 2,000 of those. There are also about 1,500 printers' assistants in the bureau. If you go over there, you will find these printing machines at work, and the power presses have one man who is in charge, a printer, and as he stands there he is responsible for the operation of the machine and lays his hands over the plate to see if it is in proper condition. The women are the assistants, and they see to it that each sheet is placed on the die in the proper manner and is taken off in the proper shape. They act as assistants to the printers. The truth of the matter is the printer is paid by the piece, and, naturally, he sets a rapid pace, and these women who act as assistants are compelled to keep the pace that he sets, and the result is that they have got to stay there with tremendous concentration from 8 o'clock in the morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, with the exception of the 30 minutes which they are allowed for lunch.

Now, these women, together with the women provided for in the other amendment, are the only people who touch our bonds or our currency or our stamps in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The printers themselves do not handle the paper at all. The paper comes in and these two classes of people take hold of it—first, the printers' assistants, who print it——

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Will the effect of this amendment be to bring them to the same pay that they get for similar work in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. No. It brings them up to the minimum pay received in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. BEE. Up to the minimum pay received in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes. These women are receiving $2.37 per day as base pay, and then they get their bonus; and this will bring them up to $2.80 base pay, the amount that the women get for similar work in the Government Printing Office, and in addition to that amount they will get the bonus, I assume.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will these girls get the $240 in addition to their regular pay?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I assume so.

Mr. KNUTSON. How much will that bring them up to?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. They are getting a little less than $740. That will bring them up to $860. They now get $740 per year base pay. The director tells me that about 50 per cent of the women over there have dependents, and I will tell you I do not see how they live.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] talks about our getting telegrams, as if we were actuated by political influence. I have not received a single telegram, and I will tell you that I am moved solely by a sense of justice to these poor women and, knowing what I do about conditions over there, I would be ashamed of myself if I did not offer this amendment. I have seen the intense concentration with which these women work, and I know the pay that they are getting and the pay that is given elsewhere, and I know that the women in these two classes are the only ones that touch the paper from the time it goes into this plant until it comes out a finished product either as postage stamps, revenue stamps, bonds, or paper money ranging in bills from $1 to $10,000 each, and yet the employees who make these bonds and this money are paid only $2.50 per day, base pay. If I did not stand up here and speak in their behalf when I know what the cost of living in Washington is, when I myself have a hard time of it to live here upon my own salary, in the face of these facts if I did not stand up for these women, who are getting less than $1,000 a year for the hard work which they are doing and with which they must support themselves and their dependents, I would be ashamed of myself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the temper of the House is to remain the same as it was shown by the vote just taken, I assume that this amendment will be agreed to. But it ought not to be agreed to, and in saying that I think I speak advisedly.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] speaks in regard to the minimum wages, and on this matter we might as well understand what we are doing. Something over 75 per cent of these girls are white girls, and about 25 per cent or more are colored. The girls that are employed here in doing this work are not skilled workwomen. They are, as I am informed, the same class of girls that you and I employ as domestics in our kitchens, but of course have some training that they get at this bureau. I would hate myself the longest day of my life if I would come on the floor of this House and vote to pay a girl in one of the Government establishments—pay her out of the Federal Treasury—and vote to pay her almost twice what I would be willing to pay that same girl for work in my own kitchen. [Applause.] You gentlemen who are employing domestics are paying, as a general rule, from $10 to $12 per week. Here you propose to pay them around $21 per week.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman tell us where we can get a domestic servant for $11 a week these days? It costs $65 a month in my town.

Mr. GOOD. Now, these girls are given some advantages that you and I do not give them in private employment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; in private employment——

Mr. GOOD. I am not yielding to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GOOD. These girls are working under very advantageous conditions. They are given, as I said before, 30 days' leave with pay and 13 or 14 holidays every year with pay. They are not employees, if you please, that have families to support. It is not that class of employees that you are dealing with here now. But that fact would have little weight.

When I spoke of the fact that we were receiving telegrams I spoke advisedly, because Members have come to me with their telegrams. Some of them I saw standing up voting for the amendment. I do not know what actuated them. Perhaps it was sympathy with these girls. I assume that it was a high motive that actuated them to vote for these amendments. But I say to the House and to the committee that when I receive a telegram of that kind I look upon it with suspicion, because I know that the person in my district that sends me the telegram knows nothing about the employment, nothing with regard to the wage or the conditions, and is simply doing what somebody has asked him to do.

I hope the House will pay no attention to them. We will dignify ourselves by casting such telegrams and letters of that kind into the wastebasket, where they belong. They ought not to be dignified by receiving any attention in the committee or on the floor of the House.

I think it is a mistake to raise this appropriation. If we are to take appropriations of this kind and raise them without any more justification than you have for this, you should forget all about your protestations of economy, all about cutting appropriations, and then just take the bill and grant the maximum that is demanded by a department and let the taxpayers pay the bill. Gentlemen on the other side of the aisle may justify their votes, for they are not responsible for the appropriations; but we are on this side.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What does economy amount to when you can bask in the smile and the approval of the Federal Employees' Union? [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Well, that is true.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. A moment ago the gentleman suggested that these employees were of the same class as employees engaged in domestic service. Is it not a fact that domestic servants get three meals a day at the expense of their employers, who pay them $40 or $50 a month besides, while these employees do not?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; that is true; and credit should be given to that extent.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Does the gentleman think anybody can live on $60 a month in this country now?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; thousands do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time on this amendment has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I shall have to insist on closing debate on these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa objects. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Division, Mr. Chairman. Let us know who in the House are in favor of economy.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 33.

Mr. GOOD. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. GOOD and Mr. NEWTON of Missouri.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 44.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

For expenses of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under the act approved October 6, 1917, as amended:

Compensation: For the payment of military and naval compensation for death or disability, $125,000,000; and the unexpended balances of the appropriations for military and naval compensation for the fiscal year 1920 are continued and made available during the fiscal year 1921 for the payment of compensation for death or disability.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word, and asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I heartily approve of this item of $125,000,000 for compensation for death and disability under the war-risk insurance act, and also the following item of $46,000,000 for hospital care, both items for the benefit of the veterans of the World War or the families of deceased soldiers. I believe there is also included in the lines at the top of page 20 something over $20,000,000. A little further on there is, for vocational training for disabled soldiers, an item of $90,000,000. The so-called Wason bill will within a short time become a law, which I am informed carries something like $7,000,000. We also have an item for additional hospital construction of about $300,000 and about $10,000,000 for administrative purposes, making in all at least $300,000,000 for the next fiscal year for the benefit of the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, or their families. If the need existed I would very gladly vote double this sum, or any other sum to be expended for the benefit of the sick, the disabled, the needy, or the families of the disabled and the dead. We owe an obligation to those men to deal as liberally by them and by their dependents as their needs may require. I have proposed some of the legislation giving better care and assistance to this class of men, and I have favored all such legislation proposed by others when before the House. I will go just as far as any Member of Congress covering these needs, and I think the veterans in my district have realized my personal and official interest in their welfare. We can not overdo the opportunity to aid those who were disabled during the late war, and the taxpayers of the country will be back of us in every move of that kind. They will gladly pay that bill.

But I want very briefly to refer to the other class of assistance for which there is such a demand in this House at the present time. In the so-called bonus legislation this feature that I have just been referring to, of assistance to the disabled, does not appear in any shape or form. I think that if we went out and asked for the opinion of the public to-day as to what the so-called bonus legislation was expected to cover, we would find the opinion prevailing in the minds of the public that it was for the distressed and the disabled and the needy, not for the men who returned to their vocations in civil life in as good or perhaps in better physical condition than when they went into the service. When we speak of assistance to the veterans of the late war, it seems to me the sick and the disabled are the class of people whom the public expect should receive the benefit of our congressional action.

During my service in Congress no subject has been as difficult a problem to study and decide upon the proper course of action as this so-called bonus legislation. As you know, a resolution of this House referred the subject matter to the Committee on Ways and Means on February 26.

On March 2 that committee commenced hearings and held them continuously all during the month of March. During the month of April a sincere effort was made to prepare legislation. It was submitted in an informal manner to the gathering of the majority last week, and evidently did not receive the approval of that majority.

All during the preparation of this legislation I have tried to follow the views of the majority of my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee rather than my personal judgment. I have not approved of the so-called consumption tax. I have not approved of the cash bonus payments to the soldiers as called for in the bills which we have been considering. I think my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee will bear out the statement that I have been for most of the time in a hopeless minority as a member of the committee. I have approved of an effort to make fair compensation settlement with the veterans of the war through a certificate payment which, in a sense, is a paid-up endowment life insurance policy. In the end it would cost the Government more than a cash bonus, but it would be better for the Government and better for the men. It would extend the burden of payment by the Government over a period of 20 years and would encourage the men in the exercise of thrift.

I have no doubt that a very great majority of the ex-service men themselves favor the payment of a cash bonus, but they do it, in a sense, thoughtlessly. They do not take into consideration the results sure to follow this enormous cash payment. Why, if you approach a man and say, "Would you like $500 free for yourself for the asking?" of course he would like it; but those men were loyal, patriotic servants of this Government under the flag, and they are just as loyal citizens to-day, and they do not want to inflict on this Government any form of taxation which will depreciate the value of the dollar, which will reduce production in this country or inflate prices. That is their test of loyalty to-day, and I appeal to these men to look at the question from the broad standpoint of their American citizenship, not from the viewpoint of the selfish individual benefits of placing in their pockets for the moment a comparatively small sum of money. Their services were patriotic, their reward not measured by dollars. The dollar mark must not be put against their patriotism, their valor, or their sacrifices. Such services as they rendered must not be commercialized, and I again appeal to them not to accept any payment that would carry with it the appearance of a cash settlement. This country, I am convinced, can not stand more taxes than it is now burdened with. We can sugar-coat the taxation pill in any way we may, but nevertheless the bitterness of the consumption will come back to the people. They are the ones that will pay the bill. You can not get up a subterfuge form of taxation that will not eventually come back on the people, and until the financial condition of this country is very much better than it is to-day, until our receipts are more than our disbursements, the country can not stand it.

Although I have received many petitions from the American Legion posts and other organizations of veterans in favor of the bonus, I have also received many individual letters from veterans in opposition to it. I am confident that when gatherings of veterans study this question from the broad viewpoint of the best interest of the country they will realize that an additional tax burden of nearly two billions of dollars should not be asked for at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. Reserving the right to object, I did not know that the gentleman from Massachusetts was going to speak out of order or I would have objected. But having permitted him to proceed out of order, when it was understood that, having given wide latitude to general debate, we would proceed with the bill under the five-minute rule without discussing other matters, I shall not object to the gentleman from Oklahoma proceeding. It is important that we pass this bill at a very early date if we are going to get through with the program. I hope there will be no further requests of this kind, because it is embarrassing to me. I do not want to object, but I do want to get along with the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I say a word before the gentleman from Oklahoma begins?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I had not understood that there was any direct agreement as to the five-minute rule. I also felt that the item of war-risk insurance being before the committee that I was, in a large sense, in order. I do not wish to intrude upon any arrangement that has been made.

Mr. MADDEN. Regardless of any arrangement that is the rule of the House.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, early in the session it occurred to me that this question of legislation for a bonus for the soldiers would be eventually brought to the attention of the House and that it would be a very troublesome subject when it did come up. I think whatever legislation is agreed on by this House, it ought to be legislation that will encourage economy and industry upon the part of the discharged soldiers. I believe that if this Government will enter into an arrangement by which young men who find themselves in straitened financial conditions can obtain a loan by which they can get into some business for themselves that the Government is not going to lose much on the wind-up.

So far as the home-ownership proposition is concerned, that is good for the everyday citizen, because the very thing that is threatening the Government to-day is the discontent of men who are without homes and who are not tied to this country.

The encouragement of a citizen to own his home is good legislation. It ought to be encouraged, and not merely because he is a returned soldier, but because it is good policy for the Government, for the future welfare of the country. It is an important question whether America is to become a land of home owners or tenants. [Applause.] Wherever the tenants are congregated you have there some men who are liable to explode whenever any crisis comes upon the country. If you want to find where we have had the most trouble during the war you will find it where men have lived under undesirable conditions.

You talk about men leaving the farm. Of course, they are going to leave the farm. We ought to have some legislation that will encourage the returned soldier to remain on the farm, so that he will not leave the farm for more inviting prospects in the city.

Now, the question comes up about procuring the money for this legislation. I want to say to you that the American taxpayer is going to call a halt when you undertake to raise taxes higher than they are now. What is the hue and cry that you hear from every man who pays taxes? The hue and cry is that Congress should reduce the taxes and not raise taxes. You have loaned $10,000,000,000 to the Allies, the income of which will be $450,000,000 per annum when it is paid. Why put the taxation for this soldiers' relief legislation on the American people? You create the machinery by which the young men who returned from foreign wars are to be taken care of, but what is the necessity of putting the taxation immediately on business and stifling the business of this country? Why not make a program by which the interest on the foreign loans can be applied when it comes in? It will bring in nearly a billion dollars if paid in full this fall. Why not arrange the machinery by which you can put the same in effect, so that the service men will know that the Congress has provided for them, and that Congress is willing to do what is fair by them and at the same time not make them unpopular in their neighborhoods because of the levying of obnoxious consumption taxes for their benefit? Why not arrange our legislation so as to apply it to that purpose whenever it is collected? It will be collected. This interest on the foreign loans for two years is due and should be paid. Without the valor, without the bravery, of these soldiers, the $10,000,000,000, the amount of our foreign loans, would not amount to anything. You can take five years' interest of these foreign loans and apply it as it comes in to this relief program and it will take care of the home ownership and such things made necessary by soldiers' relief legislation. Apply it as it comes in without burdening the American taxpayer with additional taxes. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Medical and hospital services: For medical, surgical, and hospital services, medical examinations, funeral expenses, traveling expenses, and supplies, for beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, including court costs and other expenses incident to proceedings heretofore or hereafter taken for commitment of mentally incompetent persons to hospitals for the care and treatment of the insane, $46,000,000. This appropriation shall be disbursed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and such portion thereof as may be necessary shall be allotted from time to time to the Public Health Service and the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and transferred to their credit for disbursement by them for the purposes set forth in this paragraph. The allotments to the said board of managers shall also include such sums as may be necessary to alter or improve existing facilities in the several branches under its jurisdiction so as to provide adequate accommodations for such beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance as may be committed to its care.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question with reference to that portion of this section which provides that the money shall be disbursed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and allotted from time to time to the Public Health Service and the board of managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. What does the gentleman mean by the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers? Are those the homes provided for soldiers of the Civil War?

Mr. GOOD. They were established after the Civil War, but those homes are now available for soldiers of all wars.

Mr. BEE. And they are being used now for soldiers of the recent war?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. Soldiers of the recent war to the number of 200 are in one of those homes; I think it is at the Dayton Home.

Mr. BEE. Heretofore those homes have been cared for by separate appropriations?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. There are appropriations for each of the homes carried in the bill.

Mr. BEE. I was trying to get at how much of the $46,000,000 to be used in this paragraph will be diverted into these homes away from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. GOOD. The bill carries in other provisions appropriations for each home sufficient to take care of each home for the next fiscal year on the basis of their membership. There are between nine and ten thousand vacant beds, and it was thought wise to make those beds available for the soldiers of this war.

Mr. BEE. That is, in these homes the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. Just in proportion that the Director of the War Risk Insurance sends soldiers for treatment to these homes, he will have to allot sums to take care of them, because the other appropriations are estimated for upon the present membership only.

Mr. BEE. I am very glad to get that information.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I want to congratulate the Committee on Appropriations upon this very wise provision. We have had a number of extensive hearings before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with reference to hospital facilities for the men who returned from the recent war disabled and diseased. We find that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under the present law—and I think very wisely—is charged with the sole responsibility of providing the necessary hospital facilities for these men. The question arises where he shall find the necessary buildings and institutions. This appropriation will permit him to make the proper arrangements anywhere where he can find such facilities, and particularly authorizes him to make such arrangements with the Public Health Service and the Board of Managers of the National Homes. We are informed that the Public Health Service has some hospitals and other buildings in view which will be acquired for this purpose. We have also learned that the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are available for the care of some of these men. Some changes will have to be made, some alterations installed in the present buildings, and some additional facilities provided, but the hearings before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds convinced me, and I think have convinced the committee, that the present arrangement is not only wise but entirely necessary at this time. There are particularly two classes of patients who have returned from this war who appeal to all of those who have become familiar with conditions that have arisen as a result of the war. Those are patients suffering from tuberculosis and from various mental disorders. The gas attacks during the war produced an alarming number of tuberculosis cases, which are developing from time to time and doubtless will continue to develop for years yet to come. The tremendous artillery fire of this war produced an unusual number of mental disorders, some of rather extraordinary character, which sometimes do not appear at once, but frequently develop at later periods. We must expect a very large increase, in consequence of this war, of men who are suffering from tuberculosis and from mental diseases, who will require the care of their Government. As was stated a moment ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], no greater duty has fallen upon the people of this country and upon the Congress representing the people than to take care of those men who took their lives in their hands to serve their Government in the hour of national distress, and who have now returned home shattered in body and in mind. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question in regard to the term "Independent Treasury," which occurs on line 16, page 21. That is a term that has been used for some time and I am wondering what the exact definition of it is, or at least the application of the word "independent." My understanding is that it embraces practically all of the fiscal arrangements of the Government outside of the District of Columbia, including subtreasuries, depositories, and activities of that kind, but I would like to be clear on the point because it is rather a singular term.

Mr. GOOD. My understanding of the term relates to subtreasuries and depositories as provided for by law, other than the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HICKS. If the subtreasuries are to be abolished, as the law provides, would not that then do away with the term "Independent Treasury"?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know; I would have to look up the question myself to find out its ramifications and just the branches of the Treasury to which that relates. Of course, the subtreasuries will not be entirely abolished until the end of the next fiscal year. This heading has been carried in the bill for a long time; it is a term that has grown up in the service, and my information is that it attaches not only to subtreasuries but to the other special depositories of the Government.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph carries $46,000,000, the item just ahead of it carries in the neighborhood of $150,000,000, and there are other items in the bill carrying appropriations which I think bring the total appropriations for the benefit of those who were injured or who became diseased in the late war up to in the neighborhood of $300,000,000. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. GOOD. Two hundred and eighty-two million five hundred thousand dollars in four items.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think there are some other items.

Mr. GOOD. There are some other items that are directly chargeable to the war that would perhaps bring the amount up to the sum the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This is purely for the benefit of men who were in the war who became diseased or were injured in the service.

I think that is a considerably larger sum than was ever appropriated at any one time in any one year to all those who served in the Civil War during a war that lasted four years when there were a great many more soldiers both injured and diseased than as a result of the recent war. I am not complaining of these appropriations. It seems to me it would hardly be charged that Congress has been niggardly in the consideration of our obligations toward the soldiers of the recent war when within two years of the actual expiration of the war, before it has theoretically expired at all, we are appropriating more money for those who were injured or diseased during the war, and a short war, as far as we are concerned, than was ever appropriated for any one year for all of those of like condition during the Civil War, and more money, I believe, than the entire cost of operating the Government, including all those payments right after the Civil War. The number of men who were in actual conflict was no greater and not so great in the recent war as in the Civil War. The length of conflict was not nearly so great, yet we are frequently told that we are not beginning to do what we ought to do for the men who came out of the recent war. Maybe that is true; I will not undertake to argue that at this time. We are doing a great deal more than anybody dreamed of doing a few years ago, and I expect fully as much as anybody a few years hereafter will think there was cause for doing at this time for those who were injured and diseased. Now, we are told that we must not only do that, but we must take care of those who had a great experience and came back sound and well.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The reference to the number of soldiers injured in the Civil War brings to my mind some figures. The most reliable statements I have been able to secure show that 110,000 soldiers on the Union side in the Civil War were killed or mortally wounded in battle; 249,000 died from disease during the period of the war, making 359,000 in all. Add to that those who returned with disabilities. Take into account the total number of enlisted men in that war and over against that note these figures: In the recent World War we are told by those who have investigated the subject in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Public Health Service that 641,000 were discharged with some measure of disability; about 155,000 have been examined by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and found entitled to hospitalization. About 39,000 have already received treatment; 13,247, on April 7, 1920, were in the institutions under the control of the Public Health Service; tuberculosis cases indicated by the examinations in the report, 15,528; mental troubles, 15,044, 5,000 of whom are already receiving treatment under Government service. General disability cases, 81,951.

I will not consume more time at present in rehearsing these facts. There are long lists of figures opening up this wonderful story and pointing out our responsibility. In a few days I hope that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be able to bring before the House a bill that will enable us to review in brief time the main parts of this story. Let me call attention to the two lines mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], who is also a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds engaged in the investigation of this work. The two classes of patients that appealed to me with greatest force are those afflicted with mental troubles and tuberculosis. Here are cases that will be large in number, serious in character, laying upon the Government a very heavy responsibility, which, of course, we will all be ready to meet promptly and readily as soon as exact measures can be determined. I believe that your Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has already covered the case with sufficient investigation to disclose the material facts which we hope to bring before the House in the near future.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS OBJECTS, TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use for, and in connection with, the enforcement of the laws relating to the Treasury Department and the several branches of the public service under its control, not exceeding at any one time four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs, four persons paid from the appropriation for salaries and expenses of internal-revenue agents or from the appropriation for the foregoing purpose, and four persons paid from the appropriation for suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes, but not exceeding six persons so detailed shall be employed at any one time hereunder: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury from making any detail now otherwise authorized by existing law.

Contingent expenses, Independent Treasury: For contingent expenses under the requirements of section 3653 of the Revised Statutes, for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, transportation of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, salaries of special agents, actual expenses of examiners detailed to examine the books, accounts, and money on hand at the several subtreasuries and depositaries, including national banks acting as depositaries under the requirements of section 3649 of the Revised Statutes, also including examinations of cash account at mints, and cost of insurance on shipments of money by registered mail when necessary, $160,000.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa with reference to this provision, page 21, enforcement of laws relating to the Treasury Department and the detailing of persons for the purpose of suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes. Now, what I would like to understand——

Mr. GOOD. We have not reached that item.

Mr. BEE. Page 21 says, "And four persons paid from the appropriation for suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes." What character of appropriation is that? Is not the general suppression of counterfeiting under the general administration of the Department of Justice through the marshal's office?

Mr. GOOD. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to make the special-agent force a little more mobile.

Mr. BEE. I want to understand how it is of any value to take four persons out of the Treasury Department of the United States to investigate counterfeiting.

Mr. GOOD. While this paragraph authorizes the use of certain special agents, it is also restrictive by designating the number which may be so used.

Mr. BEE. I notice here that it says, "That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury from making any detail now otherwise authorized by existing law." It struck me as a rather peculiar provision to take four men out of the Treasury Department to suppress counterfeiting.

Mr. GOOD. I do not know that there is any necessity for that now. Some years ago it was found they were using some of the Secret Service operatives for purposes other than the suppression of counterfeiting, and this was put on to stop that practice.

Mr. BEE. I thought the suppressing of counterfeiting was under the general administration of the Department of Justice.

Mr. GOOD. No; we have also a large appropriation for that. We carry $325,000 in the next item for suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. JUUL. How long has the item, or the matter from lines 1 to 15, been carried in the general law? Is this new matter?

Mr. GOOD. No; it has been carried for some time. I could not tell the gentleman, but it is at least 8 or 10 years.

The Clerk read as follows:

Money-laundry machines: For all miscellaneous expenses in connection with the installation and maintenance of money-laundry machines, including repairs and purchase of supplies for machines in the District of Columbia and in the various Subtreasury offices, $500.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman advise us what is meant by these money-laundry machines?

Mr. GOOD. After the currency becomes soiled, if it is in good condition otherwise, it can be returned either to the Treasury or some of the Subtreasuries and laundered.

Mr. BLANTON. And put back into circulation?

Mr. GOOD. Put back into circulation without the necessity of having it destroyed and issuing new currency in lieu of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it economical to so launder it and put it back rather than to print new duplicates of it?

Mr. GOOD. That has been the judgment of the Treasury Department, that they could more economically launder some of the currency if it is not mutilated.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this item all the expense connected therewith?

Mr. GOOD. No. This is merely miscellaneous expense. The other expense is carried in the legislative bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes: For expenses incurred under the authority or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury in detecting, arresting, and delivering into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction dealers and pretended dealers in counterfeit money and persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States and of foreign Governments, as well as the coins of the United States and of foreign Governments, and other felonies committed against the laws of the United States relating to the pay and bounty laws, and for the enforcement of section 18 of the War Finance Corporation act; hire and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles when necessary; per diem in lieu of subsistence, when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, and for no other purpose whatever, except in the protection of the person of the President and the members of his immediate family and of the person chosen to be President of the United States, $325,000: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be used in defraying the expenses of any person subpœnaed by the United States courts to attend any trial before a United States court or preliminary examination before any United States commissioner, which expenses shall be paid from the appropriation for "Fees of witnesses, United States courts": Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a compensation greater than that allowed by law, except not exceeding three persons, who may be paid not exceeding $12 per day.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in line 3 I move to strike out "$325,000" and insert "$375,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 24, line 3, strike out the figures "$325,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$375,000."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The committee had already recommended an increase of $50,000 in this appropriation over the current law. This makes it $100,000.

Mr. GOOD. The current law, with the deficiency, was $325,000, just as we had. I will explain to the gentleman the reason for it. Since writing up this bill the head of the secret service in the Treasury Department has discovered that there are two counterfeits of war savings stamps that are being circulated now. I have a set of those counterfeits here, with a set of the originals, and it is a matter that is so serious that I suppose nothing has given the Treasury Department more anxiety than those counterfeits of the war savings stamps. They are so perfect that the postmasters who are under the law given authority to redeem these war savings stamps can not tell which is the genuine and which is the counterfeit. A person desiring to surrender or cash his war savings stamps is now required to give 10 days' notice, and the department proposes because of the serious consequences that would follow this effort to require the person who desires to cash his war savings stamps to deposit them with the department and let them submit them to their experts. They will have to have experts in the larger cities, and they have felt there is no other way in which they can protect the Treasury of the United States in the redemption of millions of dollars of these war savings stamps. There [exhibiting] is the genuine stamp, and there [exhibiting] is a counterfeit stamp. The gentleman, I am sure, would hardly be able to determine, if I had not told him, which was the counterfeit and which was the genuine. The counterfeit has been splendidly executed, and Mr. Moran says that unless he has this additional fund—and the Secretary of the Treasury also says so—he can not protect the holders of these certificates and the taxpayers in this regard. I will say to the gentleman that he wanted more money than my amendment calls for, but it seemed to me it was of that serious character, dealing with a pretty important matter——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the excuse given was a very good one.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman if he really feels that this increase of $50,000 for the purposes stated will be sufficient for this service?

Mr. GOOD. It is very hard to say.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman recalls that the original estimate was for $400,000. The committee cut that estimate to $325,000, and since that time this trouble to which the gentleman refers has arisen. I understood the chief of the secret service to insist that he would really need the full amount of the original estimate in order to cope with this trouble which threatens to cost the Government many thousands of dollars.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that when Mr. Moran called this matter to my attention he suggested $400,000. I did not have time to take it up with the gentleman from Tennessee, but I thought the additional $50,000 would give him an amount that would permit him to get his force organized, and, if it was necessary for him to have additional funds, he could get them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I may be mistaken, but I understood it was thought he would need $75,000 instead of $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTOMS SERVICE.

For collecting the revenue from customs, including not exceeding $200,000 for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, $10,300,000: Provided, That not more than one appraiser for the port of Baltimore shall be paid from this appropriation.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARNER: At the end of line 6, page 25, strike out the period and insert: "Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury in the expenditure of this sum shall allot to the customs districts of the United States on the Mexican border such amounts as will enable those districts to perform adequately the duties authorized and required by law."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GARNER. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, but it may be. If it is, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that this amendment only directs the Secretary of the Treasury to do now what he ought to do, to wit, enforce the customs laws along the border of Mexico.

There is $10,300,000 appropriated for this purpose in this bill, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. There was $10,000,000 last year. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars of it was used for the purpose of enforcing the customs laws along the 1,800 miles of border of this country. I do not believe it sufficient; I do not think the Congress would believe it sufficient if it had all the facts before it. I offer this amendment in order that we may suggest to the Secretary of the Treasury that he use sufficient of this appropriation to adequately enforce the customs laws along the border of Mexico.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury would take the opportunity—I would not be surprised if he would—and thereupon ask Congress to give him four or five million dollars more in order to guard the coast of Mexico, the coast of Florida, the Canadian border, and various seacoasts of the United States with extra officials in order to prevent the importation of liquor into the United States. It may be proper to do that. I am not anxious myself to give the Secretary of the Treasury, under the collection of import duties—and there is still a duty on liquor, although we have forbidden its importation into the United States entirely, and it is a part of their duty to enforce that law—I am not anxious to have the Treasury Department have a line of officials standing but a very few feet apart, not only on the Mexican border but on the Canadian border, and possibly upon the seacoasts of the United States, to prevent the possible smuggling in of some liquor which ought not to be brought to the United States, and which I will not have the chance to consume, and would not if I had the chance.

Mr. GARNER. Let me say to my friend from Illinois that I am in perfect accord with his views in that particular.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is what I thought.

Mr. GARNER. So far as some of the constituents of gentlemen representing districts along our southern border are concerned, the customs laws may not be administered in such a manner as to suit them, but it is in the interest of humanity that the Treasury Department should maintain for itself a sufficient force to protect itself against the lawless element that comes in from Mexico. Recently—within the last 30 days—there have been three men killed along the border of Texas, and it can be attributed to the fact that there were not sufficient men to take care of the situation. Talk about two men going against a company of six or seven; it is very difficult, as the gentleman will realize, and their lives are constantly in jeopardy.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We have lawlessness on both sides of the border, and no doubt men will be killed on our side of the border.

Mr. GARNER. I am not suggesting that you increase the salaries, although I do believe that the customs guards' salaries ought to be increased. I think the duty of the Treasury Department with reference to the enforcement of the liquor law on the border should be to consolidate the Internal Revenue and the Customs Services. Of course, we can not do it on this bill, but since you can not remedy the situation with reference to the internal revenue and the enforcement of the prohibition act and the Customs Service, I merely want to suggest to the Secretary of the Treasury that he furnish sufficient employees along that border in order adequately to enforce the law. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make a point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, here comes a matter where the gentleman wants to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to do something that I take it he would have the power to do now.

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not believe there is any instance where, when that was done, the executive or administrative officials did not at once, or as soon as they could, say they would do this, but that they would have to have more money to do it with.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will understand that in this particular item there was $1,700,000 asked for in excess of what was given to them. They were given $10,300,000, which was only $300,000 more than they received last year.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then they would come back and say, "You have directed us to do so-and-so, and we must have the money."

Mr. GARNER. They may say that, but I do not think it will have much weight with the committee or with the Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I noticed this morning, a while ago, that the Democrats of the House, together with a few Republicans of the House, were able to put an increased item over.

Mr. GARNER. I was not in the Chamber, and the gentleman must not shake his gory locks at me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That thing frequently occurs. If the gentleman from Texas leads an assault upon the Treasury his colleagues will join him, and possibly some of the Members on this side, in the crusade against liquor. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. I am perfectly willing to take the chastisement of the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am speaking of these unholy combinations of all the Democrats with a few Republicans to loot the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] think that he ought to object to this indictment by Democratic Members of the Democratic administration? [Laughter.] You folks on the Democratic side resent it if on this side we call attention to the mismanagement and maladministration of public affairs; but when Democrats rise in their places and find it necessary to add to appropriation bills amendments to the effect that in expending an appropriation the administration shall comply with the law and protect the public interest—when they themselves feel called upon to do that, why should we object? [Laughter.]

It is a serious indictment. We have come to a pretty pass in the administration of the Government when gentlemen on the Democratic side would have us tag onto the end of every appropriation item a specific direction that in expending the money the department officials have a regard for the interests of the people and properly enforce the laws of the land. Do the gentlemen on that side want to tag appropriations with that kind of a provision? If they do, for my part I shall not object. I do not think we should object on this side.

Mr. GARNER. I am very glad to have the gentleman from Wyoming indorse the amendment, and I hope it will pass now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, as a general rule the gentleman from Texas never yields anything to this side of the House and gets everything he wants, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Question! Go ahead and put the question. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise in opposition to the general provisions of this paragraph, but to call the attention of the House to the fact that a most worthy class of employees in the Customs Service, namely, the customs clerks, are not to receive a well-deserved recognition in the way of increased compensation because of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, in submitting his estimates to our committee, neglected to provide for such increase. These clerks recently banded themselves together to promote in all legitimate ways the welfare of the members and the efficiency of the service. They are not affiliated with any organization outside the Government service, and I mention this latter fact because I have been asked to bring it to the attention of Congress.

These clerks did not consider it wise or patriotic to make a general request for increased compensation during the war, at a time when every dollar of the revenues of the country was needed for the successful prosecution of that war. [Applause.] Of course, they were made uneasy in those days when they saw the various Government departments, and especially the newly created and expanded war bureaus, taking on employees at much higher initial salaries than long-experienced employees in the Customs Service are now receiving.

The Government showed its realization of the situation by giving a so-called bonus, first of 5 or 10 per cent, according to basic salary, then $120 per annum flat, then $240 per annum flat, which is now being received. It is obvious that under present conditions this bonus is only a slight mitigation of the serious economic situation which confronts practically every class of the customs employees of the country in view of the increased cost of living of about 100 per cent in the past five years. What is a man with a family dependent upon him to do in such circumstances? First, he may resign to seek other and more lucrative employment. This is being done in too many cases for the good of the service. But work in the Customs Service is of such a specialized nature that training and experience gained there are not particularly available in commercial lines. Second, he may obtain employment outside of office hours, which, however, are not so arranged as to make this means of increasing income possible in many cases, and when it is done it is likely to be at the expense of the health and strength of the employee who is supposed to give his whole energy to the work of the office in which he is employed. Third, he may consume past savings in the present support of his family; or, finally, he may reduce his standard of living. This is of necessity the plan adopted by the majority of customs employees.

I want to say to the House that, inasmuch as the manner of living of these customs employees in the best of days can not be lavish, any reduction in the standard of living necessitated by present conditions will not make for the contentment of the men or the morale of the service. These men realize fully the great cost of the war, and that the cost must be paid by the people of this country. They expect to pay their share of the economic loss [applause], and they are not complaining of paying even more than that share; but they do feel that the time has come when the disparity between their income and that received in other and less responsible lines of duty outside the Customs Service should be lessened.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to call to the attention of the House the conditions as they exist among the 398 employees in the collector's division at the port of Boston, and I am not including the appraiser's force. Among the various classes there are 14 officials and deputy collectors. There are also 112 customs inspectors, and others who are paid at a per diem rate. This leaves 272 civil-service employees directly in charge of Collector Edmund Billings, who, I might add, has stirred my interest in these men, who are paid yearly salaries amounting to $364,605, which is an average of $1,340.46 per annum, or $111.70 per month.

Out of a total of 525 civil-service employees in the collector's and appraiser's division, there are 228 who receive $1,200 or less; in other words, 43.4 per cent of all the employees receive $100 per month or less.

May I remind the House that the men in whose behalf I appeal, most of whom are married, secured their positions by competitive examinations? They are skilled and trained men. Twenty of them have been forced recently to accept outside positions in order to secure increased wages, and I fear that many more of these valuable public servants will be compelled to leave the Customs Service if conditions are not improved. I regret to say that the men who are leaving are among the best and the youngest of the clerks. You know as well as I do that when the force is depleted by the resignation of the best clerks it will cost the Government considerable to train a new force, and the business meanwhile will suffer, because it will be necessarily conducted by the less efficient and superannuated employees.

My associates on this committee were in sympathy, in some degree, with what these men are seeking and what I personally was anxious to have them receive, but the Treasury Department did not estimate for any increases for the customs clerks throughout the country, and as it is the practice of the committee not to report in its bill any appropriations which exceed the estimates asked for by the various bureaus of the Government, naturally my suggestion that these men ought to receive more money went by the board, but I have taken advantage of this opportunity to call the attention of the House to the fact that here is one important branch of the Government service where faithful employees, who did not at any time during the past four years ask for increased compensation, now feel that they ought to be considered. I agree with them, and I would like to see an amendment on this bill specifically providing for their betterment financially. I have hopes that perhaps somewhere else in this legislative system of ours some provision may be made for these men before this bill becomes a law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

For pay, allowance, and commutation of quarters for commissioned medical officers, including the Surgeon General, assistant surgeons general at large not exceeding three in number, and pharmacists, $856,000.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As most of the Members of the House know, the conferees have just decided upon a report reconciling the two bills, passed by this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol, in relation to the pay of the officers and men of the Army, Navy, Coast Guard, and Public Health Service. I believe that report will be before us to-morrow or the next day for our consideration. Personally, I am very much in favor of that increase, and I merely want to make a statement now for the information of the committee in regard to the Public Health Service.

A day or two ago I made a brief speech on the subject of pay increases, in which I referred to the various arms of the service, and I merely wish to quote this from the public-health item in that speech:

THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

In October, 1918, there were in the regular corps of the Public Health Service 217 commissioned officers. Since that time there have been 4 admissions to the corps, 3 deaths, and 21 resignations. Prior to that date the Public Health Service usually obtained by admission 10 to 15 officers per year and lost practically none by resignation.

The reserve of the Public Health Service was established in October, 1918. In order to obtain medical officers for the medical care and treatment of war-risk insurance patients the service commissioned 472 reserve officers who were leaving either the Army or Navy. Of the number recruited in this way 76 have resigned. It is almost impossible to secure new recruits. The importance of this service, especially to those who wore the uniform in the recent war, should appeal to us to enact legislation for relief.

The fact that it is almost impossible to secure new recruits is due essentially to the fact that the pay of these men is not sufficient to attract them, and in reference to this Public Health Service we must consider that the men in that service are doing magnificent work for the men who wore the uniform of their country in the recent war. In addition to the justice of the case on its own merits, that is another reason why I am in favor of an increase of pay for those men, in order that that service can be recruited up to its full strength, so that the ex-service men may receive the benefits they so rightfully deserve.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rural sanitation: For special studies of, and demonstration work in, rural sanitation, including personal services, and including not to exceed $5,000 for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, $50,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for demonstration work in rural sanitation in any community unless the State, county, or municipality in which the community is located agrees to pay one-half the expense of such demonstration work.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 30, line 1, by striking out "$50,000" and inserting "$150,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SISSON: Page 30, line 1, strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to take this occasion to congratulate the chairman of this committee and to congratulate the full committee on the splendid work that they have done. Taking the bill as a whole, I do not think it could be improved upon, and it has my entire approval, and the only item to which I made any objection was the reduction by the committee of the amount which I have offered to increase by this amendment.

The department asked for $250,000 for this purpose. Now, I am sure that all the members of the committee know that I am deeply interested in this item, because I was instrumental in getting the first appropriation for this purpose. I believe that of all the times in the history of the Government when we ought to economize this is the most urgent. I congratulate every Member of Congress who is advocating, standing for, and voting for economy; but there are wise expenditures of money that may result in the greatest economy.

In view of the fact that the great problem confronting us now is that of an ample supply of food, and since all the food must come from the farms, whatever this Congress can do within its proper constitutional power to aid and assist in making farm life more attractive, it is our duty to do. In addition to that I think it is the greatest economy.

It has been estimated by the authorities that something like $1,000,000,000 is lost each year, counting the number of days that men are out of employment by virtue of sickness due to preventable diseases. Now, there are five diseases which cause something like 70 per cent of the sickness in the United States. These five diseases are preventable. They can be controlled absolutely by sanitation. I will not go into a discussion of all of them, but take the single horrible disease of typhoid fever. It is known that this disease can be communicated from one person to another only through and by means of human feces, as repugnant as the idea may be, unless taken through the mouth. In the sanitation of our homes throughout the country it is easy for men to make the fatal mistake of putting their toilets in their gardens, where they ought not to be. It is easy to put them where the drainage will go into gardens or into pastures where cattle drink the water. I imagine no one will deny the proposition that the greatest handicap we all suffer to-day is the handicap of ignorance. The wise and well-informed man in building his premises, if he has kept up with modern laws of sanitation, does not need instruction. This appropriation was increased to $150,000 the year we got into the war. They asked then for $250,000. When Mr. Fitzgerald was chairman of the committee, I got them to report an appropriation of $150,000, but before this appropriation was used the war broke out, and then all of this money was used in those counties contiguous to the camps and cantonments to make healthy the places where we were training our boys. The next year they were given $150,000, and the money was used in the same way. Therefore the people have not had the benefit of this appropriation. It was diverted. Now, this year the committee have recommended only $50,000, thus reducing the amount $100,000. Now, this money is perfectly safeguarded by the proviso. They can not get a dollar of this money until the local authorities have put up as many dollars. If you want to do something that in my judgment is practical and economical, to say nothing of the relief that you give by removing the causes of diseases that produce 70 per cent of the sickness in the United States, which all the authorities, bacteriologists as well as physicians, say are absolutely preventable, then I ask you, gentlemen, to vote for this amendment.

You may say that the State ought to do it, but the trouble is that the county or State, those portions where they need it the most, will be the place where they resist it the most and are least able to pay. This is for the purpose of aiding the people to realize that by proper sanitation they may relieve themselves of doctors' bills and the suffering of the sick bed. [Applause.]

In addition to that, no city can be safe. Do not lay the flattering unction to your souls that because you live in the city you are not subject to the same sort of infection that the man is who lives in the country. Because all the vegetables that are eaten raw, all the milk that goes into the great cities to feed babies, that you drink yourselves, come from the farm; and when we know with absolute certainty that by proper sanitation you can prevent diseases being communicated in that way it does seem as if Congress should be willing not to stand in its own light, but to give this pitiable sum for dispensing this information.

You say that States ought to do it. Why do you maintain the health department; why do you spend such large sums on that? Look at this small item, even if you make it $150,000. Look at the sums that you give to look after the health of soldiers. I am not complaining about that; but if you would complete a proper system of sanitation you will find that you may be able to reduce the other appropriations very much more than you would spend by giving the people the proper information as to these communicable diseases. [Applause.]

So if I wanted to sustain this item as a humanitarian I could call attention to the suffering on the beds of illness throughout this country, and if I could cause men to believe and know that the failure on the part of Congress to appropriate $100,000 more than you are giving here would relieve the heartaches and suffering I do not believe that a single Member of Congress would decline to vote for the appropriation.

Ignorance of disease is what causes most diseases. Ignorance of how to take care of the health is what causes most all ill health throughout the country. So you can confer, in my judgment, great benefit on the people as a matter of cold-blooded economy estimated at about a billion dollars. When you take into consideration the doctors' bills and the suffering, you can not measure that in dollars and cents.

If this is true, the only thing necessary to convince you is whether or not the expenditure of the money will tend to do that. If I could convince every Member of Congress that the microscope and bacteriological investigations have been able to isolate all the germs that produce these five diseases with which the people are afflicted and that they can be prevented, then surely no one would oppose this increase. It seems to me that we are making progress along the right lines, not in curing the diseases but in preventing the diseases.

Every county health officer who has had an opportunity to see this trial without exception says that this is the best money expended in the United States, and I hope, gentlemen, that you will vote, with all of these other millions that you are expending for the purpose of making health laws, building new hospitals, and developing the great health department of the Government—that you will do this much to give the people throughout the country the information that they need to assist in protecting them from disease, and a protection which will make healthier, stronger, better, and safer all the people who live in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, no one will deny that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is one of the real economists of the House. He is a very valuable Member of this House. No one has contributed more by hard work and industry to bring about real economy in Government expenditures than has the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. He has given of his time and strength at all times to bringing about results. But, like the rest of us, he has his fads. He has not many, but he has one, and that fad is rural sanitation. It stands and abides with him.

We are all in favor of public health. We want to see a good state of public health all over the United States, but I am afraid we are not getting very far with an appropriation of this kind. I am perfectly willing to continue the work with the amount that we carry in the bill to see whether or not the public service can really accomplish something along the line that the gentleman from Mississippi has indicated that he wants to accomplish. In 1916 and 1917, during both of those years, when the gentleman's side of the House was in control, they appropriated $25,000. Then came the war, and you appropriated $150,000, and a large part of that was used because of sanitary conditions around the camps. Last year for a peace-time program you appropriated $50,000, and we have carried in this bill the same amount. I submit to the gentleman from Mississippi that after all this is an experiment.

Mr. SISSON. As a matter of fact, the estimate for the last appropriation was $500,000.

Mr. GOOD. The last estimate was $500,000, the same as the estimate for this year.

Mr. SISSON. I will state to my friend that every time the item has been refused by the committee it has met my vigorous protest.

Mr. GOOD. I know that it has. If the result which the gentleman desires, if we could reduce the death rate by a simple appropriation of $100,000 or $500,000, that would be worth while to make the appropriation. But I am afraid we are not getting very far. What is the program? It is to allot about $8,000 to a county. So far as it has been applied, wherever studies and surveys have been made, they have not been followed by the adjoining county at all. The money spent in the county, with the expenditure of Government funds, the rest of the counties do not take up the rural sanitation as advocated by the Public Health Service.

I am afraid that a good deal of the money we are carrying here in this respect is going to be wasted, but because of the fact that it is to produce a better condition with regard to the health of the rural part of our country, it seemed to the committee wise to carry the appropriation that is carried for the current year for a little while longer, to see whether or not something that is worth while can be accomplished. I do not believe that we should increase the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOARD OF MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION.

For commissioner, $7,500; assistant commissioner, $5,000; necessary and proper expenses incurred in connection with any arbitration or with the carrying on of the work of mediation and conciliation, including rent in the District of Columbia, traveling and other necessary expenses of members or employees of boards of arbitration, furniture, office fixtures and supplies, books of reference and periodicals, salaries, traveling expenses, and other necessary expenses of members or employees of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, to be approved by the chairman of said board, $22,500; in all, $35,000.

Authority for incurring expenses, including subsistence, by boards of arbitration shall first be obtained from the Board of Mediation and Conciliation.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, on page 31 and page 32, by striking out all of the language commencing on line 17, page 31, down to and including line 6, on page 32.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment, that that part of it which relates to lines 17 to 25, inclusive, on page 31, and lines 1 to 3, inclusive, on page 32 comes too late, in that the paragraph containing it had been passed and that the Clerk had already read lines 4, 5, and 6, a new paragraph, on page 32. The gentleman's amendment comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was on his feet seeking recognition when the Clerk began the reading of the paragraph beginning on line 4, and the Chair thinks it would be unfair to apply the rule strictly in the present instance.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman did not call on the Chairman until after the Clerk had finished the reading of lines 4, 5, and 6, which form an entirely new paragraph, on page 32.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to recognition. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CASEY: Page 31, beginning on line 17, strike out all of line 17 down to line 25, inclusive, and all of lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 32.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, this item carries an appropriation of $35,000 for a Board of Mediation and Conciliation, as provided for in the act of July 15, 1913. I find in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations on page 435 that Mr. William L. Chambers, a commissioner for the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, on February 10, appeared before the committee and gave testimony as to the necessity of this board. I find that on or about February 28 the Esch-Cummins railroad law was passed which provided for a labor board. Section 304 of that law provides—

That there is hereby established a board to be known as the Railroad Labor Board, and to be composed of nine members, as follows:

There is then specification as to the persons who are to constitute the board.

Section 307 of the same act provides, among other things, that the labor board shall hear and as soon as practicable, and with due diligence, try any dispute involving grievances, rules, or railroad conditions.

I also find that section 316 of the same act contains the following language:

The powers and duties of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created by the act of July 15, 1913, shall not extend to any dispute which may be received for hearing and decision by any adjustment board or the labor board.

In the face of these facts I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or some other member of that committee what are the duties of this board provided for in the bill now under consideration?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this board was established in 1913. Just what the conflict, if any, will be between the Board of Mediation and Conciliation and the Railway Labor Board provided for in the transportation act it is difficult to say. We took up with this Board of Mediation and Conciliation the matter of whether or not there was going to be any conflict. The chairman of the board, Mr. Chambers, said that there would be no conflict, and subsequently wrote a letter, in which he said:

It is possible that during the coming fiscal year some controversies, which might under the Newlands law come to an arbitration board appointed for that particular purpose, may be taken under the jurisdiction of the Railroad Labor Board provided for in the transportation act. The members of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation can not attempt to foretell just what course a railroad labor dispute will take before a satisfactory settlement is reached, but should a controversy of some magnitude or several cases of smaller proportions be referred by the parties to arbitration under the act of July 15, 1913, providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of railroad labor controversies, the Board of Mediation and Conciliation might be compelled to appeal to Congress for a deficiency appropriation should the suggested reductions in the appropriations for 1921 be put into effect.

My understanding of the situation is this, and I am very frank to say that it is somewhat superficial. This Board of Mediation and Conciliation, given the jurisdiction to conciliate disputes that arise between railroad companies and their employees, have some powers with regard to conciliation not given to the labor board.

The committee has kept in mind the gentleman's viewpoint, that Congress has already reduced appropriations with regard to conciliation in labor disputes—and that question was raised by others—and we did not want to take the responsibility for cutting out an appropriation and destroying the usefulness of a board that might by its activities bring about a state of harmony and peace between the employer and employees in railroad transportation and thought it was best to give the reduced appropriation.

Mr. CASEY. May I ask the gentleman whether, in the face of the language contained in section 316 of the railroad act——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY. The language of section 316 of the railroad act is as follows:

The powers and duties of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created by the act approved July 15, 1913, shall not extend to any dispute which may be received for hearing or decision by any adjustment board or by the labor board.

Under that language, could the gentleman imagine any dispute on the railroads over which this Board of Mediation and Conciliation would have jurisdiction?

Mr. GOOD. I think they must have thought so, or they would have repealed this.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, does it not repeal it anyway by implication?

Mr. GOOD. The Board of Mediation and Conciliation do not understand that they have taken over their function, and I think the President does not believe that the functions of the board has been entirely taken away from them by that act.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The only excuse for the continuation of this board is not for the purpose of settling any disputes that might arise between railroads and their employees but for the purpose of settling disputes that might arise between other activities.

Under the language of the statute the gentleman has just read I think it is a complete repeal of this law in so far as they would have any jurisdiction over disputes with railroads.

Mr. CASEY. What other activities has the gentleman in mind?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In industrial disputes——

Mr. CASEY. Oh, no; because the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created under the act of July 15, 1913, is known as the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created by the passage of the Newlands Act, which had to do absolutely and only with railroad disputes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If that is true, they have exceeded their authority, because they have reported hundreds of cases of conciliation that had nothing whatever to do with railroads.

Mr. CASEY. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken, because there is a division of mediation and conciliation in the Department of Labor that has to do with all industrial disputes other than railroads.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What is the difference between that board and the board now under consideration?

Mr. CASEY. The difference is that the Division of Mediation and Conciliation in the Department of Labor does some real constructive work, while this board will do nothing but draw its salary and make financial reports to the Congress.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Then I am clearly of the opinion that if the gentleman is correct with reference to the jurisdiction that the statute he has read absolutely repeals this there is no occasion for this.

Mr. CASEY. I want to say, further, Mr. Chairman, I have read the hearings; here they are, and I think I am justified in saying it is practically only a financial report of the activities of this board. I want to say, further, that the railroad employees of the country do not recognize this board as having jurisdiction and never did recognize it to any great extent, and I am of the opinion that if we carry this item in this bill and still continue this board we are going to have a conflict of authority, and we are not going to have any centralized authority in the handling of these labor disputes, and that is essential. We must have centralized authority in the handling of those disputes. We may have decentralized administration, but when we commence to decentralize authority and decentralize administration, then you are breeding trouble and, in my opinion, that is all that this does.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There no doubt is a great deal in what the gentleman says, but I take issue with the statement that this Board of Mediation and Conciliation has done nothing more than submit financial reports to Congress.

Mr. CASEY. I did not mean to be understood as saying that; I mean after the passage of the railroad act. That is about all they can do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, in so far as future work is concerned, there may be a good deal in what the gentleman says, but here is the situation: The transportation act, the so-called Esch law, has just been put upon the statute books and the labor board provided for under that act has just been appointed and has just taken charge——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask that the gentleman have two additional minutes.

Mr. CASEY. Make it five.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, while it may be true that under the transportation act, as the gentleman has said, the board will have entire control or jurisdiction of all labor disputes that may arise between the railroads and the employees, notwithstanding that, inasmuch as that board has just taken hold, does not the gentleman think that it might prove unwise without further investigation to repeal on this bill, so to speak, the law providing for this particular Board of Mediation and Conciliation?

Mr. CASEY. I will say in reply to the gentleman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And, if the gentleman will permit me, the committee in making this appropriation did not give them the full amount that has been carried for the current year, but cut them down to the minimum.

Mr. CASEY. I will say in reply to the gentleman that if the labor board provided by the railroad act is going to be workable and amount to anything, we must centralize the authority. We must not have any conflict of authority. That is essential in all of these labor disputes, and if we provide in this bill for one board of mediation and conciliation and provide in the Esch-Cummins Act another board to handle these labor disputes, there is an opportunity of passing the buck, so to speak. [Applause.] What we want to do is to centralize authority and make those who are charged with the responsibility under law settle these cases.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield further for just one suggestion?

Mr. CASEY. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There could not possibly be any conflict as I view it, but if there were any conflict between this board having only $35,000 at its disposal to pay salaries, and so forth, and the labor board under the transportation act, then undoubtedly the labor board created under the transportation act would have the right of way, because that law has only recently been passed and would supersede any authority or jurisdiction carried in the act of 1913.

Mr. CASEY. Let me say in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee if the testimony given by Mr. Chambers is worth anything, if it is worthy of consideration at all, then we are justified in believing it would lead to a conflict of authority, because in his statement before the committee he denies the jurisdiction of the board created under the Esch-Cummins transportation law and assumes that his board of mediation and conciliation has jurisdiction in certain cases; there is a conflict right there as stated in the testimony before the committee, and I do not think that Congress should be a party to it.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. If I understand the situation, we have the railroad law just passed?

Mr. CASEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAYTON. As far as language can make it, it establishes a board for the settlement of railroad disputes?

Mr. CASEY. Of railroad disputes.

Mr. LAYTON. Of railroad disputes. In the Department of Labor we have a board for the settlement of industrial disputes?

Mr. CASEY. Yes, sir; the Division of Mediation and Conciliation.

Mr. LAYTON. Then, why in the name of common sense do we want to go to the expense of another board for any other purpose when that covers the whole ground?

Mr. CASEY. I am trying to strike it out of the bill, and I am trying to convince the Committee on Appropriations and the Members of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that it should go out.

Mr. LAYTON. I will vote with the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. I will.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman has impressed me with the strength of the authority he shows, and unless the committee can show me there is some situation that the adjustment board does not reach I can not vote against the amendment to strike this out.

Mr. CASEY. Let me say to the gentleman in reply—not depending entirely on my own judgment in this matter—I went to the trouble this morning of going to see Mr. Shepherd, of the railroad conductors, and other officers of these great railroad organizations, and asked this question, in the face of the language contained in the Esch-Cummins law, what jurisdiction or functions this board would have, and they said it would have absolutely none; that it is absolutely useless; and, so far as they were concerned, we could eliminate it. That is the position of the men who are supposed to use this board.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The labor board under the transportation act, as I recall, can not act except upon application. Is that correct?

Mr. CASEY. That is the labor board, but that does not prevent the other boards from acting, from which there may be an appeal to the labor board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair would like to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it would clear up the parliamentary situation somewhat if his amendment concluded with line 3 on page 32.

Mr. CASEY. If that will clarify the situation, I ask unanimous consent that I may modify my amendment to that extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. To what extent?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, technically, the Chair having held that the amendment was in order, it should end on line 3 on page 32. The Clerk had only read down to and including line 3, page 32.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, as I understand, the amendment seeks to strike out from lines 1 to 6 on page 32?

The CHAIRMAN. That was the form of the amendment, and the Chair suggested the amendment be modified so that it would include only line 3.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was under the impression that the labor board created under the transportation act was not given authority on its own motion to enter into labor disputes or make labor investigations. It must be on application.

Mr. BLACK. My recollection of that is, if the gentleman will yield, that if an increase in wages should be given that will be sufficient to create a necessity for substantial increase in rates, then the board itself could assume jurisdiction over the dispute.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BLACK. No; the railroad board that we speak of. In the first instance, the adjustment boards created by the men on the railroads are supposed to act, but if it comes to the knowledge of the Railroad Labor Board that the advances given by these adjustment boards are such that would probably involve a substantial increase in rates, they can assume jurisdiction, even though they may not be appealed from.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is where the adjustment board acts. The adjustment board, in the first place, can not act except upon application.

Mr. CASEY. My understanding of it is—and, of course, there are none of us who can be too certain about what the precedents will be as we go along—at this time, when a dispute arises on the railroad, the representatives of the workers and the representatives of the carriers get together with their bipartisan board, or local board. They have the right to handle the grievances as to wages, working conditions, and arrive at settlements. If they settle a controversy satisfactorily to both sides, that is the end of it, provided that the settlement will not force an increase in the freight rates, and if it does that, then the labor board can reach down and upon its own initiative take hold of the case; only in that case can they take the initiative, but the employees or railroad managers can go to the labor board from the local board.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is very likely that in every case one of those boards will be called on. What I wanted to get at was this: Suppose there was a threatened strike on the railroads. I do not think under the law, as I recall it, the labor board has any jurisdiction except it is applied to or that the adjustment board has any jurisdiction except it is applied to. The Board of Mediation and Conciliation is a "butter in."

Mr. CASEY. I think that is the danger of the whole thing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It may be advisable to have somebody with authority to officially "butt in." That is what I am talking about. And they have in various cases in the past, at least where strikes were threatened, tendered their services and accomplished the result of preventing a strike.

Mr. CASEY. That is true, but we did not have the board then as set up in the transportation act.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand, but under the transportation act is there any authority given to the board there to "butt in"?

Mr. CASEY. It is my understanding that there is.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was under the impression they could only act upon application.

Mr. CASEY. My understanding is just the opposite.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. GOOD. The labor board would take jurisdiction under dispute upon the application of 100 or more unorganized employees, but not less. Now, this board of conciliation would take cognizance of a dispute where any number of organized employees appeal for mediation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They do not have to appeal to the board of mediation.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; on the application of the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if this is a duplication of service, I am perfectly willing that it shall go out. I am not satisfied and was not satisfied at the time that it was a duplication of service. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] if he is willing that this go over until to-morrow, until a little further investigation may be made in regard to the law? I intended to make a further investigation in regard to the transportation act and make a comparison. Then it can come up on his motion.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, that is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the item be passed, with the motion to strike out pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the paragraph beginning with line 18 on page 31, down to and including line 6, page 32, be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Reserving the right to object, am I right in understanding the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say that he has no objection to this going out?

Mr. GOOD. If there is a conflict between this board of conciliation and the other board——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is not the gentleman convinced by the very clear statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY], as I am convinced by the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and by reference to the various acts that we have passed creating the boards that have already been mentioned, that there really is no necessity whatever for the maintenance of the board mentioned in the bill, and that their functions have really consisted only of drawing pay and sending a report to Congress? Now, if that is the only function, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is convinced of that, as I am convinced of it, why should we hesitate? Why should not this go out?

Mr. GOOD. I am not convinced, and I do not think the membership of the House or the gentleman from Pennsylvania would want to do anything that would require that we should back up. If this board were found to be performing a service that is done by the other body, it should go out. My only point is that we ought to make an investigation and be sure we are right before we proceed.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Can the gentleman conceive of any actual work that this board has to do that will justify its existence?

Mr. GOOD. I can conceive of some cases, if it were left in there, where the one board would not take jurisdiction of a case and where the other board would have jurisdiction.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would not the result of such a condition as that be to shirk the responsibility and "pass the buck," as has already been suggested?

Mr. GOOD. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the two paragraphs concerning the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, beginning on page 18 and ending with line 6 on page 32, be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, might not this circumstance exist, that the new railroad board recently created by Congress may not be empowered to take any initiative whatever; that they may be permitted to adjust differences only after the matters have been submitted to them by one or both of the contending parties, while the present board, when difficulties arise, may take the initiative themselves and go out and seek to adjust the difficulty? Might not that circumstance exist, which would cause the chairman very properly to desire time in which to look into the matter?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

For expenses made necessary by the act entitled "An act establishing a Commission of Fine Arts," approved May 17, 1910, including the purchase of periodicals, maps, and books of reference, to be disbursed on vouchers approved by the commission by the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, who shall be the secretary and shall act as the executive officer of said commission, $10,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the chairman of the committee that the act only authorizes an appropriation of $10,000. This carries $10,500. I would like to ask if the gentleman would not be willing to change the sum to $10,000?

Mr. GOOD. The act only provides for $10,000. The committee has simply reported the amount that has been carried for several years for this purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the very reason why it should not be carried further.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will withdraw his point of order I am perfectly willing to offer an amendment reducing it to $10,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky withdraws the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 14 of page 32, the figures "$10,500" and insert the figures "$10,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 32, line 14, strike out the figures "$10,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$10,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION.

Salaries: Three commissioners, at $4,000 each; secretary, $3,000; attorney, $4,000; chief statistician, $3,500; chief of accounts, $2,500; assistant chief of accounts, $1,600; accountant, $2,250; claim examiners—chief $2,250, assistant $2,000, assistant $1,800, five assistants at $1,600 each; special agents—two at $1,800 each, two at $1,600 each; clerks—7 of class 3, 12 of class 2, 27 of class 1, 3 at $1,000 each; chief telephone operator, $1,000; messenger, $840; experts and temporary assistants in the District of Columbia and elsewhere to be paid at a rate not exceeding $8 per day, and temporary clerks, stenographers, or typewriters in the District of Columbia, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $100 per month, $10,000; in all, $124,940.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. How much additional compensation is embraced in this paragraph, I would like to ask the chairman?

Mr. GOOD. How much over the current law?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The total amount carried in this bill is $124,940, as compared with $91,290 for the current year.

Mr. BLANTON. Then there is something like $33,650 of increase?

Mr. GOOD. No. I should have said as compared with $108,240. It is between $16,000 and $17,000 increase.

Mr. BLANTON. Between $16,000 and $17,000?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a movement on foot now with regard to this question of increases of salary, to pay the schoolteachers in the District of Columbia an additional compensation called a "bonus" to the extent of $500. I do hope that that will pass, and I hope the chairman will permit that amendment to be offered on the bill. I intend to offer it, if no one else does, before we get through with this bill, and I hope that neither the chairman of the committee nor anyone else will make the point of order against it.

If there is any one class of employees on God's green earth that is underpaid, it is the teachers of our land, and especially the teachers in the District of Columbia. You talk about these young, unskilled girls down here who are employed in very ordinary positions in the departments, for whom we passed an increase in appropriation this morning, receiving a little less than $1,000 a year with their bonus, very ordinary positions, while you will find school-teachers in this District who are graduates of colleges and universities, who have been teaching here for years, who do not get more than $1,000; people who are highly intelligent, the very best skilled teachers in the land, and we let that item pass by here every year. We have granted them a little increase, but the little increase that we have granted them does not amount to a bagatelle by the side of some of these other increases.

Why is it that we always are willing to let it pass? Why is it that we do not give them this $500 bonus? If we are so concerned about other employees of this Government, why are we not concerned about the teachers of the District of Columbia? I hope that when the rule is brought in here that is now under contemplation, which will shortly appear from the hip pocket of the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], making in order certain items that are going to be stricken out of this bill on a point of order—I hope that when that rule is finally prepared and brought in here it will make in order this $500 for the teachers of the District of Columbia.

This is one increase that you will find me voting for with you shoulder to shoulder, and I will even vote to increase it and enlarge it over the $500, because I believe that every teacher in this District is entitled to it. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has the gentleman received a telegram?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I have not received any telegram from a person on earth on this subject; and if I should receive one it would find its way into the wastebasket if it was propaganda. I do not pay any attention whatever to propaganda telegrams. As soon as such a telegram comes I throw it into the wastebasket and do not pay any attention to it, unless it is a telegram like those which came to me from the people of the country during the time when we were so afraid the railroad bill, which saved this country from bankruptcy, was going to be vetoed, and the people of this land waked up and began sending telegrams here to Washington asking that the President sign that bill to save this country from bankruptcy.

I did pay attention to those telegrams, and produced some from about 50 citizens that I received from the State of Michigan one morning. I merely want to say in behalf of the teachers' bonus proposition that I hope arrangements will be made in time to let it go into this bill, and that it will not be stricken out on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Vocational rehabilitation: For an additional amount for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, funeral and other incidental expenses (including transportation of remains) of deceased trainers of the board, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $90,000,000, of which sum not exceeding $5,000 may be expended for rent of quarters in the District of Columbia if space is not provided by the Public Buildings Commission: Provided, That the salary limitations placed upon the appropriation for vocational rehabilitation by the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 19, 1919, shall apply to the appropriation herein made.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FESS offers the following amendment: Page 35, line 7, strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 and in lieu thereof insert as follows: "That no person be paid by said board out of the appropriation contained in this act at a rate of compensation exceeding $2,500 per annum and rates above that sum, except not to exceed the following: One at $7,500; 2 at $6,000; 4 at $5,000; 30 at not to exceed $4,000; 40 at not to exceed $3,500; 20 at not to exceed $3,250; 80 at not to exceed $3,000; 80 at not to exceed $2,750; 100 at not to exceed $2,500."

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this amendment does not strike out the proviso. It retains it, because I agree that we ought not to give blanket authority to any commission to pay any sort of salary they please. I think that would be a very serious blunder. Therefore the limitation is retained, but an effort is made in the amendment to increase slightly the salaries of something like probably 150 employees of this board.

As the membership of the committee know, the Committee on Education has been holding an investigation of the Federal Board for Vocational Education every day since the 2d of March. That investigation is going on at this moment over in the House Office Building. We have covered the ground very exhaustively as far as we have gone. Some facts have been brought to light that would indicate that there have been some mistakes made that might be regarded as more or less grievous. However, I do not want at this time to make any sort of a report of this investigation, because later on the committee will likely make a regular report when we have closed the case.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's amendment begins with salaries at $7,500 and goes down to $3,500. The gentleman knows of the testimony given by Mr. Holder, a member of this board, to the effect that prior to the time he went on this board for two years he had been drawing $6 a day for week days and no pay for Sundays, with a travel allowance.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And that when he went on the board his salary immediately went up to $5,000.

Mr. FESS. My colleague on the committee will take notice that I have not referred to the salaries of the board. I am applying this amendment simply to the salaries of the rehabilitation staff.

Mr. BLANTON. The evidence shows that men who had never dreamed of such salaries in private life in the ordinary business world had their salaries raised up to $3,500 and $4,000 and in some instances to $4,500 by the board after they were employed in this office.

Mr. FESS. I am not responsible for the appointment of any particular parties. I am sure my friend on the committee shares fully in what I am about to say, that the rehabilitation work will demand as keen an appreciation and ability as any work that we have in the country to-day; and I am constrained to believe that the work of the staff has been hopelessly crippled by the Government paying higher salaries in other work that certainly is not superior to it and that is through other departments robbing this particular division of its best men. I want the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to note this: The testimony given by the director yesterday showed us that they are losing to the War Department, which is doing not rehabilitation but vocational work, the best men they have, and nobody would say that the vocational work under the War Department is anything like as important as the rehabilitation work of the Federal Board. This Government ought at least to forbid the robbing of the best talent in the rehabilitation work by the War Department in its vocational work. We have found great loss in the staff for rehabilitation, not only by other departments of the Government taking them but also by private industry taking them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the gentleman's amendment provide that there shall be this number appointed at these salaries or not exceeding this number?

Mr. FESS. Not exceeding this number. There will be one at $7,500. That will be the director. There will be two at $6,000, who will be the district vocational superintendents, one at New York and one at Chicago. Then there are 12 other superintendents in these various districts.

Let me say to the committee that there has been surprising information that has come to our committee on the character of the work that is carried on now. We have compared this work with the work in Canada and the work in other parts of the world. Up to date, gentlemen, there are registrations in this work of 206,666 soldiers. Contact has been made with 174,197. Surveys have been made of 141,953. Approvals, section 2, which carries with it compensation allowances so that expenses are paid while they are in training, 58,099. Section 3, which does not carry compensation, but does carry tuition privileges of books, etc., 36,000. There are now in training 28,800 in section 2 and 1,834 in section 3. Approved, but not in training, 29,299 and 34,166. Gentlemen of the committee, the most advanced nation outside of our own in rehabilitation is Canada. Great Britain does a good deal, but it is mostly voluntary. France appropriates but very little for this work, and that is voluntary. Italy has not done anything like Canada. Canada is the furthest advanced of all, and here are the figures for Canada: Approvals, 37,693. Begun training, 33,845. The approvals in our country, instead of 37,693 as in Canada, are 94,000. Begun training, 38,000, and the committee must keep in mind that we have been at the work two years shorter than Canada.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. BEGG. Can the gentleman give the ratio of approvals to the number of those needing rehabilitation service?

Mr. FESS. I can not give the ratio, but it is much larger in our favor. That is largely due to the fact that our law is more liberal. There will be this question for the committee to consider, and that is whether we ought to eliminate entirely section 3 training, which does not carry compensation, but allows every soldier that has been crippled in a degree to be eligible to the training. If you do that, you are going to take in a great number that do not now embrace the opportunity. When I asked those in authority how much that would add, they said in four years it was contemplated to complete all the work and it would cost something like $455,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. The four years will not include very many, because there are only a few that enter college work, for example, in a four-year course. Quite a number, however, for three years, and a larger number for two years. We have made appropriations, and I think very generously, of $90,000,000 in this bill. That is really all that has been asked.

I want now to reinforce what has been said here so many times from so many different sources, that in the case of taking the disabled man and putting him on his feet, to make him a self-supporting individual, to avoid anything like the attitude of charity, to be cared for by the Government, is one of the finest pieces of work that any Government has ever undertaken to perform.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. If we should pass the gentleman's amendment and raise these salaries, does not the gentleman know that it will simply induce officers who are now in charge to give larger salaries?

Mr. FESS. I have not the right to say that, but my judgment is that there will be some reorganization.

Mr. BLANTON. If we were sure of that, you would not find me making any point of order.

Mr. FESS. I have no right to say what the committee will recommend and I do not know what the House would do, but with all the work that is going on there have been some lapses and there is a lack of esprit de corps and breach of morale that ought to be by all means corrected.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Is it not a fact that unless you do have larger salaries it will be absolutely impossible to procure these instructors?

Mr. FESS. Absolutely; and not only that, but you will lose what you have.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent are they losing these instructors?

Mr. FESS. To an alarming extent. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that I mentioned a moment ago, that we are losing these men from the rehabilitation work to the vocational work in the War Department. I have the figures that will show that this division has been losing to the War Department doing vocational work because they are paying higher salaries. If there is a limit here, there ought to be a limit there, because it is not fair and it is crippling one of the most important pieces of work that we are doing, and I hope the chairman of the committee will let this amendment go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more. I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If we should agree to the gentleman's amendment, what is there, then, to prevent the War Department continuing its depredations by increasing the pay?

Mr. FESS. There is not anything.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then what good will it do?

Mr. FESS. I think, gentlemen of the committee, that one of the greatest items of deterioration that this Government has ever suffered was when we voted a lump-sum appropriation to the War Department, and the War Department started out, even in the personnel organization here, to disorganize all the salaries. I have in mind one case of an assistant to a man who got a good salary, where the assistant got only two-thirds of the salary of his chief. He was taken in the War Department in this city to do some other work, somewhat similar to what he was doing, and immediately he was placed on a salary one-third higher than that of the chief that he had served under. I speak of a man who went out of the Congressional Library. That is true all along the line, and it seems to me we ought not to permit one division like this one to be continually interrupted by some other governmental division taking our best men because they pay a larger salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is new legislation, unauthorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there is no law which fixes a certain number of employees or attempts to fix their salary. This legislation seeks to do both. It seeks to fix one man at $7,500, two at $6,000, and some others at $5,000, and so on, and it increases in a substantial amount the present appropriation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is subject to a point of order. The same item was carried in last year's bill, and it is a limitation instead of an addition.

The CHAIRMAN. The language in the bill to which the gentleman proposes his amendment is as follows:

That the salary limitations placed upon the appropriation for vocational rehabilitation by the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 19, 1919, shall apply to the appropriation herein made.

The effect of that language is to reinsert in this bill the language in the sundry civil appropriation bill to which it refers. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is in exactly the same language as the limitation carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill of last year, with the exception that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio increases the salaries beyond the amounts carried by the limitation placed in the bill last year. The Chair thinks that if the language of the original limitation was in order as a limitation on the sundry civil bill last year, and if the language which is now carried in the bill is in order, as the Chair believes it is in order as a limitation, it is in order to amend the limitations in the way proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, as the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio does not change existing law, and the Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the desire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to improve the efficiency of the Federal Board for Vocational Education and to make their work more effective. I think perhaps the greatest work which Congress has authorized is the work of the rehabilitation of the soldiers injured in the recent war. It is a work that has the sympathy of all of us, and I am sure no one wants to do anything that will interfere in the slightest degree with the efficient operation of that board. What I am unable to understand is this: Originally the estimates were submitted to Congress in the regular way for $38,750,000, and the board itself asked for the very limitation which is carried in the bill. Again, on April 9 of this year, the acting chairman of the board submitted an estimate for a supplementary appropriation, and in that estimate the acting director again asked for the same limitation with regard to salaries to be carried in the appropriation for the next year. It is true that a few days later the acting chairman of the board directed a letter to the chairman of the committee asking that that limitation be removed, buf after asking $90,000,000 for next year, the fact that the acting chairman of the board, after having worked under this limitation, and knowing what the limitation was, asked that the limitation be continued for the next year.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The director of the board, when he was originally appointed, received $10,000. The director discontinued the work the early part of last year. His position has never been filled. The man who has his work gets $6,000 a year, or $4,000 less than the director originally received. I do not want to make statements that might be misconstrued, but we can not hold that man very long, because we can not keep such men at that salary. It seems to me that the chief of the rehabilitation work ought to be paid a salary commensurate to the work that he is doing, and it is now $4,000 less than the director originally received.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, under the present limitation we have 1 at $6,000, 2 at $5,000, 28 at $3,500 to $4,000, 70 at $3,000, 60 at $2,750, and 100 at $2,500.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not informed as to how the War Department got the right to pay superior salaries. Can the gentleman give me the information as to that?

Mr. GOOD. It was a lump-sum appropriation carried in the Army act, and that lump sum is carried in the current law and also in the bill that passed the House recently.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And as usual we always find these moneys appropriated by lump sum are expended in some way that Congress does not desire.

Mr. BLANTON. And yet we keep on appropriating in that way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With reference to these particular salaries of the Vocational Board, there are three of them that are better than the salaries now paid Congressmen, although nominally the salary of a Congressman might seem higher. Along the same line of reasoning we would not be able to get competent men to come to Congress. I refer now to the one who receives a salary of $6,000 and the two who receive a salary of $5,000. Because of the extra expense entailed by being a Congressman, those sums make those salaries much more desirable from a monetary standpoint than the salary of a Congressman.

Mr. FESS. The superintendent of the New York office has been changed four times, and each time the man went out on a better salary.

The present man who is there has been under fire for some time, especially during this investigation. The question is, If there is a vacancy how are you going to fill that at $5,000 a year?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I am not sure I shall not vote for this amendment; but I will ask my friend from Ohio, if I may have his attention for a moment, if he does not know a number of prominent educators in his own State who are not getting $5,000 a year salary? I know of a good many in my own State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I will ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Now, another thing to which my attention is directed is the rate of increase in administration expenses. For example, it is growing about as follows: In July the administrative expenses for salaries and wages were $249,000; in August, $327,000; in September, $307,000; in October, $228,000; in November, $317,000; in December, $459,000; in January, $419,000; in February, $351,000; in March, $496,000, or an average of $352,000 a month for salaries and wages when the total appropriation, including the amount paid to colleges and universities and schools for tuition, including the allowances under the law for subsistence, and so forth—the whole appropriation included thus far this year is $30,000,000, with a deficiency pending of $8,000,000. Now, I submit that the administrative expenses for this board, not for the men who train the men but the men who are examining the men for training and placing them, is out of all proportion to what it ought to be for the money expended. [Applause.] Now, I want to say in fairness to the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman has been going into this matter, and he knows much more about it than I do, but there was no estimate made before the Committee on Appropriations for enlarging this limitation, and we assumed—and, I think, had the right to assume—that that limitation was satisfactory. We knew the work was increasing, and therefore felt that it might be unwise to cut down the limitation, and therefore left it where it is. Certainly the committee was entitled to some information if the limitation was to be removed. Notwithstanding that, I would not urge that as an argument against the amendment, for the work is too important to be judged by any such standard.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit me, one line of inquiry in this investigation brought out the fact that there were not the type of men doing the work who I think ought to be employed. I do not want at this stage to make any adverse criticism. I think the director or chief who is in charge of the work now is an unusually serviceable man, and I think every member of the committee has been wonderfully impressed with his grasp of the work, and yet he tells us he has been crippled in the work right along the line we have been mentioning here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more.

Mr. GOOD. And I will yield that to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this, that the cost of the rehabilitation is most largely increased in the cost to the Government for rehabilitating the subjects and not the overhead. We took the figures yesterday of the overhead expenses. There have been some statements made that they have been somewhat startling, and we found that the overhead charge has been lessening constantly, until now it is less than 12 per cent, and if you can find any institution doing educational work where the overhead is less than that, you will do what I think can not be done.

Mr. GOOD. I know the gentleman from Ohio wants to be fair——

Mr. FESS. I do, absolutely.

Mr. GOOD. This does not include the overhead of the institutions where these boys are sent. That overhead goes on just the same, but it is an added overhead.

Mr. FESS. I mean the overhead in reference to those simply employed by the educational board.

Mr. GOOD. This is all overhead I am giving; this $350,000 a month is all overhead.

Mr. FESS. The overhead would be but 12 per cent of the total outlay for the past three months.

Mr. GOOD. That is about correct.

Mr. FESS. And that is very low.

Mr. GOOD. I should say that it is much larger than any other Government institution that I know anything about except the Public Health Service.

Mr. FESS. Let me say to my friend that the thing that is distressing us is to make a contract with the soldier, and we are trying very hard to touch every individual who needs rehabilitation, and that, quite naturally, requires a lot of traveling.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is a very great service, and, as some one stated a few moments ago, there is no service that is being rendered to the disabled soldier at this time which in any degree equals it, and I am sure that every Member of the House is anxious to have every reasonable appropriation made which is necessary to give to the disabled soldier the very best service. If in order to do this it is necessary to increase salaries of the various officials of the board, the House will not refuse; but I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that there was no estimate asking for a change or an increase of the salaries being paid to the employees of the board here in Washington. There was no request made by anyone who appeared before the committee on the hearings that those salaries be increased. There was no complaint made to the committee that they were unable to get proper and efficient service and competent supervisory officials to administer the law. Now, I am very much surprised at my distinguished friend from Ohio, whose sincerity and intense loyalty to principle everyone concedes. Time and time again he has stood upon the floor of this House and talked about the necessity of economy. Time and time again the gentleman from Ohio has spoken of the extravagance in the Government and of the necessity for curtailing our expenses to the lowest possible minimum consistent with efficiency, and I agree with him entirely. But here we have a proposition, meritorious, everyone knows that, but a proposition in which the parties themselves are not asking for an increase, so far as the hearings before this committee are concerned, a proposition on which no estimates have been submitted asking for an increase, and yet the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). Offers an amendment which will carry a considerable increase of salary to men who are now being employed in the Federal Board of Vocational Education.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman will agree with me that in our effort to economize we must not economize with respect to the crippled soldier?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly not. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. FESS. That is one thing we all agree on. Secondly, if the gentleman were in the conduct of this work and was under fire, with a newspaper publishing articles making attacks that are very bitter, and those attacks the subject of editorials throughout the country, would the gentleman come to Congress and ask for more money?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would if I thought I was honestly entitled to it and deserved it. But I will state to the gentleman that these estimates were submitted last October, before this criticism to which the gentleman refers had arisen; and even at that time, so far as the estimates show, these salaries were considered satisfactory, and no request was made that they be raised. We are all willing to allow every dollar necessary for the comfort, welfare, and training of the crippled soldier. But, for my part, I am unwilling to make that a reason for increasing the salaries of those who are administering the law, unless it is clearly shown that they should have it. And in saying this I am not minimizing the value of the work being done by a number of highly worthy and efficient officials of the board. But we all must agree that this is a time for the practice of rigid economy.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask this question: The director of this work was on a salary of $10,000. Why should we cut the chief of the rehabilitation service, who has the major work of this whole affair, to $6,000? Now what is the justice of that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I do not say that the former director was not worth $10,000 or that the present one is not worth it. But I assume that a year ago, when Congress fixed the salary at $6,000, and when the present official who is now occupying that position and drawing that salary accepted it, it was considered fairly sufficient for the amount of service rendered.

Mr. FESS. Then it was new work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have no quarrel with the proposition to give the full amount that is necessary to obtain the most efficient service in this very meritorious and highly necessary work.

Mr. FESS. I know that is true.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But here the committee is confronted with propositions to increase salaries in a great many branches of the Federal service. There was no request from this board in the hearings, but there were requests submitted from other departments and other services. Now, the committee in a spirit of economy, believing this was no time, gentlemen, to increase salaries, believing this was a time when the utmost economy should be practiced, endeavored in this bill to reduce the expenses of this Government and hold them down just as low as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Until the Committee on Education, of which the distinguished gentleman is chairman, can at least complete its investigation and make a report as to what salaries should be allowed, I hope this amendment will be rejected and that this House will not by way of an amendment offered from the floor undertake to increase these salaries and——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for half a minute?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Committee on Education had a session and made this recommendation this morning.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I submit it ought to come by way of legislation to the House and permit the House to discuss it as a matter of legislation and not by an amendment to an appropriation bill, as is sought here.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] which would permit certain officers and employees of the Federal Board of Vocational Education to receive greater compensation than is now being paid them. I think it would result in more efficient service and will retain men in the work who are now already fitted by training and experience to best carry out the purposes of the law providing vocational training. If we are ever going to do anything for the men who have been wounded, crippled, and disabled in the service of our country in the way of giving them vocational training, it must be done with as little delay as possible. I happen to have had experience recently in appealing a number of cases to the vocational board here, and also have had occasion to learn something of some of the men who are now working on that board. For instance, over at Baltimore there is a man working as an officer on the Vocational Training Board who left a salary of $3,300 per year as dean of one of the leading universities of this country and went into this service at $3,000 per year. By reason of insufficient appropriation for this work his salary is, after more than a year's service, reduced to $2,500. My attention was called to this, and I was advised that he would resign from the service unless his compensation is immediately increased.

Knowing that he is a valuable man, I made inquiry at the head office here in Washington to ascertain why it was that men with the training and experience this man has were not receiving more salary than $2,500 per year. I was informed that there are about 15 other men equal in experience and training with this man who will be forced out of the service or will retire in a short time unless some additional legislation or law granting a more liberal compensation is enacted. The man I have reference to is particularly fitted for this work; he is not only a graduate of the University of Texas, from which institution he holds the degrees of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, and Bachelor of Laws, but has had wide experience as a training-school director and industrial training; he has attended northern and eastern universities and has credits that would almost, if not quite, enable him to secure his doctor's degree. He has made a special study of training schools and colleges of the United States and their entrance requirements with a view to being able to place enlisted men in any particular school or institution that would best fit them for their chosen work. Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize that the examination and placing of these men with efficiency and quickness in the field is vitally important at this time in order that the disabled men may be placed in training now rather than allow the work to drag along and their classification and placement be delayed until some future time, because if the men find they will be delayed, and there are many delays throughout the country now, they simply will not take advantage of the law. Already the service men are complaining of the delays. I have received letters from the different posts of the American Legion complaining because they are not able to get the wounded, crippled, and disabled men in a position to get the training they should have with sufficient promptness. I think this amendment should be adopted in order that we may do for these boys what we ought to do and do it now. A year from now may be too late; many of them will be in different vocations regardless of their wounds or injuries, and they will not drop the work they then have undertaken to take up other lines in order to get the training should it be offered them later, whereas they would take it now if their applications could be promptly considered and their training made immediately available.

My interest in this amendment does not go so much to the officers who are administering this law, though I think they are entitled to just treatment, as to the wounded and disabled boys. As was indicated by the chairman, the administration of this law and the placing of these boys is indeed a large undertaking, and, according to his figures, up to date there are registrations in this work of 206,666 soldiers. Contact has been made with 174,197. Surveys have been made of 141,953. Approvals, section 2, which carries with it compensation allowances, so that expenses are paid while they are in training, 58,099; section 3, which does not carry compensation but does carry tuition privileges of books, and so forth, 36,000. There are now in training 28,800 in section 2 and 1,834 in section 3. Approved but not in training, 29,299 and 34,166. From this it will be seen at a glance that there is much work yet to be done, and it goes without saying that if the men who have been in this work from the beginning, by reason of insufficient salaries or other causes, should retire and the vocational boards be deprived of their services, the work will be greatly disorganized, and consequently there would be many and serious delays, and who, except the wounded, crippled, and disabled soldiers, will suffer by reason of this delay? I am in favor of strictest economy at all times, but I am not in favor of practicing false economy when the burden of such short-sightedness will fall on the wounded and disabled soldiers of this country. For these reasons I strongly urge the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 31.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks for tellers. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twelve gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused. On this vote the ayes are 22 and the noes are 31, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on line 1, page 35, to strike out the word "trainers" and insert the word "trainees."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 35, line 1, after the word "deceased," strike out the word "trainers" and insert in lieu thereof the word "trainees."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

For five commissioners, at $10,000 each; secretary, $5,000; in all, $55,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in the course of the debate on yesterday there was some discussion of a provision pertaining to reclamation projects contained in a bill introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] providing for adjusted compensation for the soldiers of the late war. This provision is as follows:

Any unit not allotted to a veteran or repatriate within one year after the public notice in respect thereto, as provided by this section, may be disposed of to qualified citizens under the provisions of the reclamation laws.

At that time the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] stated that this provision was put in by the clerks of the drafting bureau. I have no doubt the gentleman from Idaho was so informed and believed his statement to be correct, but it happens that he is in error in this particular. I have examined into the matter and I find that the provision was contained in the original draft presented by the subcommittee which was appointed to consider this title and that this draft was presented to the drafting bureau as a basis for its work. Consequently the drafting bureau had nothing to do with its being in the bill, and I might say also, to the credit of the drafting bureau, that it never makes any changes in a bill which would alter in the slightest degree the policy of the measure unless especially directed by the committee in charge. I make this whole statement in justice to the drafting bureau, as some criticisms were expressed as a result of the remarks of the gentleman from Idaho.

And I might say further that, in my opinion, the provision is of no importance or value and might just as well be taken out of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not that water that has already gone over the stream?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman knows as much about that as I do. I make correction in behalf of the drafting bureau.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 13724. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Sabine River at or near Orange, Tex.; and

H. R. 13590. An act granting the consent of Congress to Sid Smith, of Bonham, Tex., for the construction of a bridge across the Red River between the counties of Fannin, Tex., and Bryan, Okla.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all other authorized expenditures of the Federal Trade Commission in performing the duties imposed by law or in pursuance of law, including personal and other services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, supplies, and equipment, law books, books of reference, periodicals, printing and binding, traveling expenses, per diem in lieu of subsistence not to exceed $4, newspapers, foreign postage, and witness fees and mileage in accordance with section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission act, $900,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. The chairman knows something of what we call the "bunch of reds" in the United States having crawled into this department down there; the gentleman knows a little of that proposition, does he not?

Mr. GOOD. I have seen some newspaper comment on that subject, but personally I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the chairman how much of this $900,000 is to be expended by the "red element" in this Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. GOOD. Of course, none of it ought to be used in the employment of persons tinged with that color, but the chairman has no knowledge with regard to the persons employed, except what he has seen in the newspapers, and that has been denied. I have no personal knowledge of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the chairman object to an amendment limiting this appropriation and providing that none of this appropriation shall be paid in salary or per diem to any person who preaches the overthrow of this Government by force and violence? I think maybe that will reach some of them.

Mr. GOOD. Well, that might involve some expense in the administration of this fund. If there are any such persons employed there, of course they ought to be discharged. No administrative officer ought to think for a minute of employing people who are not loyal citizens of the United States or people who advocate the doctrines referred to by the gentleman. I can see how it might involve administrative expense to ascertain the facts in regard to the question.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. I would like to have the chairman of the committee give us his opinion as to whether it would not be necessary to have it adjudicated that such a person was guilty of entertaining these convictions?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. You might have to constitute a court for that purpose.

Mr. KINKAID. I favor the idea, but——

Mr. GOOD. The idea is all right, but it might be difficult of execution.

Mr. BLANTON. We have just had a ruling to the effect that a member of the communist labor party in the United States who believes in that kind of doctrine is not deportable under the laws of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERDEPARTMENTAL SOCIAL HYGIENE BOARD.

The duties and powers conferred upon the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board by chapter 15 of the Army appropriation act approved July 9, 1918, with respect to the expenditure of the appropriations made therein are extended and made applicable to the appropriations for similar purposes made in this act.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make the point of order on the ground that it is new legislation, and it is trying to reenact a former act of Congress carried on an appropriation bill that expires with the appropriation period covered by that bill. There is no existing law for it. If the Chair cares to hear something about it, I have got it here in front of me.

In the Army appropriation bill passed in 1918 an Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board was created, consisting of certain officers of the Government. It was created for four purposes: First, "to recommend rules and regulations for the expenditure of moneys allotted to the States under section 5 of this chapter." Section 5 merely makes an appropriation of $100,000 for the carrying out of the purposes of the act for the prevention and cure of venereal diseases, and so forth. That is the first purpose for which it was created; therefore the duties of that board are limited to the expenditure of that $100,000 carried in the appropriation act of 1918.

Second, it was created "to select the institutions and organizations and fix the allotments to each institution under said section 5," thereby limiting and demonstrating that this was a temporary war measure to cover the period of two years.

Third, it was created "to recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy such general measures as will promote correlation and efficiency in carrying out the purposes of this chapter by their respective departments."

That relates to the protection of the cantonments of our soldiers from venereal diseases during the war.

Fourth, it was created "to direct the expenditure of the sum of $100,000 referred to in the last paragraph of section 7 of this chapter."

And this $100,000 was to be used under the direction of the Interdepartmental Hygiene Board for the purposes for which any of the appropriations made in this chapter are available.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, every duty of this board is limited to carrying out a definite appropriation made in the Army appropriation bill. Had it been intended that this should have been permanent law it would have said "the appropriations herein and hereafter made for these purposes," but no such intention exists in any portion of the act. No idea is expressed in any clause, paragraph, or portion of it except that it was for a war measure, and to protect our boys in the cantonments, and so forth, during the war. This paragraph to which I have reserved the point of order in this bill recognizes the fact that this is not permanent law, because it attempts to reenact it. Therefore the paragraph to which I objected in the present bill is subject to the point of order as new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GOOD. The Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board was created by chapter 15 of the Army appropriation act of July 9, 1918. That chapter was clear, pure legislation, and nothing else. It created a permanent department of the Government.

I was somewhat of the opinion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] when this matter was first presented. The committee went into the hearings. Men who drew the act came before us and gave us their interpretation of it. Then, after a close reading of the act, it appeared that it was the intention of Congress to create this board as a permanent board. Chapter 15 provides:

CHAPTER 15.

Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board: That there is hereby created a board to be known as the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board to consist of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury as ex officio members, and of the Surgeon General of the Army, the Surgeon General of the Navy, and the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, or of representatives designated by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, respectively. The duties of the board shall be: (1) To recommend rules and regulations for the expenditure of moneys allotted to the States under section 5 of this chapter; (2) to select the institutions and organizations and fix the allotments to each institution under said section 5; (3) to recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy such general measures as will promote correlation and efficiency in carrying out the purposes of this chapter by their respective departments; and (4) to direct the expenditure of the sum of $100,000 referred to in the last paragraph of section 7 of this chapter. The board shall meet at least quarterly, and shall elect annually one of its members as chairman, and shall adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of its business.

If it was not the intention of Congress to make this board a permanent board, then why did Congress say that annually the board should elect one of its members to act as chairman?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the gentleman know that that original act carried an appropriation for two years?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I know it did.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then to elect annually would cover that period.

Mr. GOOD. No; it does not say that at all. It says annually, and "annually" does not mean for a period of two years. It means annually.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It provided for one election during the meantime.

Mr. GOOD. I think that would be a very narrow construction, which the gentleman would not ask the House to make, on a law that provides what shall be done annually to say that it shall be done only for two years.

Now, it is true that that legislation was on an appropriation bill. The gentleman must recollect that many of the appropriations carried in the Army bill are specified for longer than a period of one year. Especially was that true during the war. Now, here was a cooperative work that was necessary during the war, but intended as a permanent thing. The appropriation was made to cover a period of more than one year, I assume, because of the allotment that would lapse at the end of one year, so that during the war there might not be any break in the work carried on by the board.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In the paragraph to which I make the point of order you use this language:

The duties and powers conferred upon the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board by chapter 15 of the Army appropriation act approved July 9, 1918, with respect to the expenditure of the appropriations made therein are extended and made applicable to the appropriations for similar purposes made in this act.

Does the gentleman contend that that is not new legislation on this bill?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, that is new legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then the gentleman concedes that that point of order is well taken.

Mr. GOOD. On which bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. On this bill, where you attempt to extend the law of 1918. The gentleman certainly does not contend that that is not legislation on this bill. Whether it is necessary or not is another question.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have not the floor.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If this provision were not in the bill, would there be any authority for this board under chapter 15 of the Army appropriation act of July 9, 1918?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Would there be any authority?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes. I agree with the gentleman that this is purely legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This says that the authority heretofore granted shall be extended for the future.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. That is exactly my contention, and that is purely legislation on this appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is all it is. It is not an appropriation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; it is legislation on this appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I fully agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Put in there in order to make the appropriations available.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Is the gentleman's point of order to the language in lines 24 and 25 on page 35?

Mr. BUCHANAN. My point of order is to the entire paragraph and also covers that language. That is the object of that paragraph, to extend this war act of July 9, 1918, and to lay the ground for the appropriations in this bill. The chairman of the committee recognizes that this is new legislation and that there is no existing law to justify this legislation unless this paragraph is in the bill to make it available.

Mr. GOOD. I think as far as the language in this particular paragraph is concerned the point of order is well taken; but the point that I have been trying to make is that if the appropriation is justified under the act, then this language ought to be carried so far as the administrative provision is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Chapter 15 of the Army appropriation act of July 9, 1918, contained a provision creating the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board. Some of the provisions of that act appear to be permanent law and some of its provisions appear to be intended to continue in force for a period of two years only. The effect of the provision to which the gentleman's point of order is made appears to be to extend not only the provisions which are permanent law and which do not need to be extended, but also to extend the provisions of the law which by its express terms expires at the end of two years into the next fiscal year. The Chair therefore thinks that the provision to which the gentleman makes a point of order is legislation, and sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of the board, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, books of reference and periodicals, printing and binding, traveling, and other necessary expenses, $80,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to that provision on the same ground as the other. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation of $80,000 covers the expenses of the hygiene board and personnel in the District of Columbia. The sole purpose of that board is to direct the distribution under the original act of an appropriation made to be distributed to the boards of health of the several States.

If you examine the original act, it provides an appropriation for two years, and by its own terms it specifically states that it expires within the period of two years. Therefore, if the original amount to be distributed among the States in the act expires in two years, it has already expired, and this board ought also to go with it. As far as that is concerned, I can not see that any portion of the act is a permanent law.

I call the Chair's attention again to the very purpose for which that act was created. It was for the purpose of directing the distribution of a specific appropriation made in a specific section of that bill. When that distribution has been accomplished, then the whole act dies with it. I hope the Chair will read the purposes for which the act was created, because it specifies and limits the activity of the board on four propositions. These four propositions are carried in this bill; and if it was intended to be permanent it would have said something to that effect.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish, if I may, to reenforce the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas. It seems to me that the clear import of all the sections in this bill, except section 5, is to enable the administration of section 5. If the Chair will note, the purpose is, first, to recommend rules or regulations for the expenditure of moneys allotted to the States under section 5 of the act; second, to select the institutions and organizations and fix the allotments of each institution under said section 5; third, to recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy such general measures as will promote correlation and efficiency in the carrying out of the purpose of this chapter by their respective departments; fourth, to direct the expenditure of the sum of $100,000 referred to in the last paragraph of section 7 of this chapter. Every purpose that is defined in the act is with reference to the administration of section 5, and section 5 is merely the appropriation.

It seems very clear to me. Of course, we are familiar with the circumstances out of which it was adopted. It was for the purpose of protecting those who were called into the military service during the war. It was necessary to provide some method for the administration of the fund, and therefore this machinery was provided. It all centers, it goes to the very heart of it, on section 5. All appropriations expire at the end of two years.

Now, as for the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa that the word "annual" makes it permanent law, I can not agree to that. If I understood the gentleman correctly, his entire argument is swung around that word "annual" as a pivot.

Mr. GOOD. No; I think the first provision, where the board is created, contains language clearly of a tenor to indicate that it was a permanent board.

Mr. GARRETT. May I call the attention of the gentleman to this, and I read from the act: "The duties of the board shall be"——

Mr. GOOD. That is where they define the duties. Leaving out the question of duty, the question is whether or not there is a board here of this character. Certainly it appears to me from the reading of the language that it was the intention of Congress to create a board as a permanent board.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not agree in that opinion. I think the board was created simply to administer this fund, that there was no purpose of creating it as a permanent board, because of what use would the board be after it had administered the fund? It seems to me that there was a necessity of creating some agency to administer the fund, and this was the agency created. With the expenditure of the fund the function of the board ceased. As far as the word "annually" is concerned, of course that appropriation was to run for two years, and there could be, and I presume there were, if they obeyed the law, two elections of the chairman of the board.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to admit the force of the contention of the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Texas if it were not for the fact that the act itself negatives this contention. The act, among other things, authorizes the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board created by it "to recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy such general measures as will promote correlation and efficiency in carrying out the purposes of this chapter by their respective departments." I emphasize the word "chapter" in this connection.

The chapter not only provides for the creation of the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board but also for the creation in the Bureau of Public Health of a Division of Venereal Diseases, the duties of which are in part "to study and investigate the cause, treatment, and prevention of venereal diseases; to cooperate with State boards of health," and so forth. The life of this division is not limited to any given period, and duties which are apparently intended to be performed by it are duties which may be performed after the expiration of the appropriation carried in section 5.

Again, in section 5 the proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That the appropriations herein made shall not be deemed exclusive, but shall be in addition to other appropriations of more general character which are applicable to the same or similar purposes.

That proviso indicates that the board was expected to function not only with respect to the specific appropriations carried in the act but also with respect to appropriations which might be carried in other acts or which might perhaps be carried hereafter.

In the view of the Chair, it does not appear that the existence of the board has expired by virtue of the act itself. The Chair therefore thinks that the paragraph is in order, and overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For assisting the States in protecting the military and naval forces of the United States against venereal diseases, $150,000; and the unexpended balance on June 30, 1920 (approximately $250,000), of the appropriation heretofore made for this purpose is continued and made available during the fiscal year 1921: Provided, That no part of these sums shall be expended in assisting reformatories, detention homes, hospitals, or other similar institutions in the maintenance of venereally infected persons.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that we have already passed items for the Public Health Service, one item of $856,000, another of $275,000, another of $740,000, another of $40,000, another of $135,000, another of $8,000, another of $85,000, another of $45,000, another of $625,000, another of $220,000, another of $5,000, and one of $500, aggregating $3,034,500, and to that aggregate is added the sum of $4,000,000. Does the chairman think that it is necessary to appropriate the extra $150,000 and make available also $250,000 additional?

Mr. GOOD. This is not administered by the Bureau of Public Health.

Mr. BLANTON. I know it is not.

Mr. GOOD. Of all the amounts the gentleman has indicated, there was an appropriation of $200,000 available for venereal diseases. The $150,000 which is appropriated here, together with the unexpended balance, is to be expended in those localities around Army and Navy camps, and is to protect the enlisted man.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman recognizes that this was a wise provision during the war, when we had our boys in camps all over the country in every State in the Union, but such is not the case now. The camps are mostly abandoned now.

Mr. GOOD. There is a good deal of unrest in the United States. A good many of the boys have not gone back to work. There is a good deal of unrest around these Army and Navy camps. I do not think this ought to be a permanent thing, and I hope the time is soon coming when the whole appropriation can be elimrinated.

Mr. BLANTON. How many men have we in camps of the United States to-day as compared with November 11, 1918?

Mr. GOOD. I am not advised; but, of course, we have a great many less.

Mr. BLANTON. We have comparatively very few, and surely the States themselves can take care of this proposition, aided and assisted by the Public Health Service, with the $200,000 we have already given for this purpose. I do not think these sums ought to be appropriated, and I make the point of order against the paragraph. It contains new legislation on an appropriation bill and is unauthorized by law.

Mr. GOOD. It is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. There is new legislation in the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman point out wherein it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The provisions in this paragraph are not in accordance with the provisions in the original act.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, absolutely they are.

Mr. BLANTON. How about the proviso?

Mr. GOOD. That is a limitation, and that is intended to preserve and save the appropriation. I want to say this to the gentleman from Texas: He speaks about the number of men in the service of the United States as compared with the time the armistice was signed. The number of venereally afflicted persons at the time the armistice was signed was from 20 to 30 per thousand, and that number has gone up at the present time to from 90 to 100, a very alarming increase.

Mr. BLANTON. Then we have wasted the great sums of money that we have heretofore appropriated?

Mr. GOOD. The amount here is less than $2 per man.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman state that since this board began operating the Government appropriations the number of persons afflicted with these diseases has begun to increase?

Mr. GOOD. I would not say from the time the board commenced to operate. I have forgotten now the percentage of venereally infected persons who were within the draft, but it was very large. According to the statement of Dr. Storey, it would seem that since the time of the signing of the armistice the number has very largely increased. The committee was somewhat influenced by those figures. The reports show that the condition is somewhat alarming.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa the reason for the provision in this bill that prohibits the use of any of these funds for reformatories or houses of detention?

Mr. GOOD. That is to prevent their use for that purpose.

Mr. BEE. In the city of San Antonio, which has a very large military establishment, it has been the custom in the past for the Public Health Service, through the Federal assistance, to render help to these institutions and detention camps near the great Army post there. We have a division there. The city has built a detention camp outside of the city limits, in which these people are kept.

Mr. GOOD. That would not fall within the provisions of this appropriation. It would come under the next provision, that has to do with the allotment to the States.

Mr. BEE. I just wanted to know whether the purpose was to withdraw from these detention camps, where these people are kept, any Federal assistance, especially when it is in the interest of the Army.

Mr. GOOD. No; the purpose of this limitation is that no part of the money shall be used for the maintenance and support of persons when they are detained, and the law does not embrace that, and the committee felt that no money should be expended; in fact, that it would be an enlargement.

Mr. BEE. The proximity of the large Army camp at San Antonio, I regret to say, is one of the things that makes necessary this large detention camp.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas insist upon the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. No; in view of the statement made by the chairman of the committee, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the House briefly on two important issues. My reason for requesting time at this juncture is that 10 members of the Indian Affairs Committee, myself included, by direction and authority of this House, will leave on May 7 for a brief trip of investigation and inquiry into important problems concerning the Nation's wards, the Indians, and vitally affecting the interests of our Government as well in its dealings with disputed and vexatious questions bearing upon our relationship to the various Indian tribes, numbering in the aggregate 300,000 souls. I have been a member of the Indian Affairs Committee since my service began here more than five years ago. Every Member of the House knows that the annual Indian appropriation bill carries an average of $11,000,000, and affects not only the Indians themselves, but hundreds of thousands of our citizens with no degree of Indian blood in their veins. If we defer this investigation until Congress begins its recess early next month, we shall not be able to visit and inspect the various Indian schools now in session, but which will then be dismissed for the summer. These schools are maintained, in part, at Government expense, and if we are to gather the information concerning these schools that this House expects us to obtain, and thus justifying the action of the House when it inserted the clause in the last Indian appropriation bill directing us to make this investigation, it is imperative that we go now.

SOLDIERS' RELIEF BILL.

Every one fully expected that the House would dispose of the soldiers' relief bill last Monday, the day agreed upon for its consideration, but the Republican caucus, which met on the evening of April 30 and which lasted far into the night, determined to postpone action on this important measure until some future time, and because of this postponement, which I personally deplore and regret, our investigating committee, composed of six Republicans and four Democrats, will be denied the privilege of being present to vote on this bill and to take part in the discussion concerning the same. My colleagues from Arkansas will secure for me a pair on this measure, and I record my vote for it. I also secured a pair with Mr. RHODES, of Missouri, a Republican and a member of the investigating committee, on all political matters that will come before the House during our enforced absence.

Reluctantly we entered the great World War. I supported every measure proposed that promised to conduct it vigorously and end it successfully. My only son, eligible for service, fought as a volunteer in France from the summer of 1917 until the last gun was fired on the 11th day of November, 1918, and came home bearing upon his body the scars of honorable wounds received while battling the Hun in the air high above the fields around Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, and the Argonne Forest.

We can never repay our chivalric young men who breasted the red-tide battle on foreign shores or those who left their homes and good positions preparatory to settling our quarrels with the insolent foes of peaceful civilization, but who were denied the honor of measuring their armed strength with the disciplined soldiery of the Central Powers. We have made and must continue to make generous provisions for our injured and disabled heroes and the dependents of our dead who sleep under the poppies of Flanders or the lilies of France.

During July and August, 1918, I had the good fortune to see the American soldier in action around and beyond the bloody trenches and shell-torn battle fields at Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry. I saw him in action fronting the trained veterans of the Crown Prince and driving them back at the point of his bayonet. I saw him grimly standing in line of battle, mud-bespattered or covered with the black dust of awful war. I saw him on the roadside shaking with shell shock and torn by German shells, brave, cheerful, smiling, patient, and fearless, bold as a fierce young eagle, admired and envied by all the allied soldiers, and I stood in pity and in sorrow and yet with a heart swelling with pride, hat in hand, beside the rude mound marked by a wooden cross where he slept in a new-made grave under the gray soil of France, the brave and beautiful land that he had defended with such signal gallantry. We must not hesitate to do justice to our living heroes or to make ample provision for the mothers or children or wives of those who died that civilization might not be destroyed by the ruthless militarism of Germany.

We can never fully compensate our young men who thus gamely battled under the allied flags in far-away Europe, and we should not haggle about a small recognition which will only partly express our admiration and love for the American soldiers.

I introduced a soldiers' relief bill two months ago. I earnestly hope the pending measure will pass, but I seriously object to the sales-tax feature, that seems to have the indorsement of the majority of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee. This unhappy provision proposes to touch with the Midas finger of Government authority every bootblack, every washerwoman, the poor widow, the hod carrier, the soldier himself—in fact, every citizen, and bleed gold from him to raise the bulk of the revenue necessary to pay the Nation's debt to its brave defenders. This money should be collected from bloated and swollen war profits, from contractors who fattened and grew lusty and purse-proud by gainful production under the careless eyes of those who were charged with the duty of rapidly procuring in the least time possible the vast equipment, supplies, food, and munitions necessary to send our troops to the front and to furnish them and help supply our allies with the swift means of winning the war. We should get this revenue—estimated to amount to a billion eight hundred million dollars—not from the weak, the poor, the small merchant, the farmer, the modest tradesman, the soldier, and the overburdened consumer—God pity him; he is suffering enough already and his back is bent with a burden of taxes and high cost of living ponderous enough to sink a Navy—but we should collect this fund from the heartless cost-plus Army contractors and from the corpulent pocketbooks of the suddenly rich millions of our stay-at-home profiteers, for whom our soldiers fought and our laboring people worked early and late that they might pile up limitless billions to waste in idleness and in luxury. They are the beneficiaries of the war which they so urgently advocated and desired, and they should now be compelled to disgorge a reasonable portion of their hastily acquired riches to compensate those who fought their battles for them. [Applause.]

THE WATER-POWER BILL.

I voted against the general water-power bill as it was finally reported by the conference committee of both Houses and passed by the House on May 4 last by a vote of 259 ayes and 30 nays. This bill has been pending many years. I am not a reactionary in any sense. I am in favor of progress and have always favored, and still favor, a proper and reasonable water-power bill, and have advocated such a bill, but the measure as finally agreed upon and passed by this House did not sufficiently safeguard the rights of the public. This bill as it finally passed violates well-established, well-settled, and wholesome principles of law, and both State and individual rights. The bill recklessly substitutes Federal interference and control over really non-navigable streams. It is proposed under this bill to erect a mighty dam in my district on a stream that is in no real sense a navigable stream at the place where the dam will be located. The farmers who own fertile sections of bottom land in Marion, Baxter, and Boone Counties in the third congressional district of Arkansas, which I have the honor to represent, those farmers who own places on White River and its tributaries above the proposed dam site, have written me numerous letters and have sent in petitions which I have filed in this House vigorously protesting against this measure, which means the destruction of farms on which they have lived for years and which they do not want to sell.

It is true that their property can not be taken or injured without compensation, but they insist that they have a right to be heard in protest and have the constitutional right to object to this legislation, and as their representative I have responded to their wishes and respected their petitions. The measure of damages to them for their loss and injury, as defined by the courts, will not, I am afraid, result in giving them just compensation for their losses. At best it is a harsh rule, under the provisions of this bill and under the general doctrine which obtains by reason of the law of eminent domain, to say to a home owner that this corporation or that, organized or financed by strangers in a far-away State, can take the home that his father carved out of the wilderness, the home where he played in childhood, the cemetery where his loved ones are buried, whether he chooses to sell or not. It is at best a rather one-sided privilege which allows to the stranger the right to institute a condemnation suit and drag a home owner to a far-away court and compel him to take his neighbors there as witnesses, force him to pay attorney's fees, and permit strangers to assess his damages and say what he should have for the home of his youth, which he prefers to keep and has no desire to sell. In response to the prayers and wishes of many of my farmer constituents, whose homes and farms will be destroyed by the dam proposed to be erected under the provisions of this bill, I joined with 29 other Members of this House and voted "no" on the passage of the bill mentioned, a record of the final vote on the same being shown on page 6539 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 4, 1920. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, my district had commissioned me to represent them in Congress when war was forced upon our Government on April 6, 1917. We had made every effort possible to remain neutral. However, neutral ships flying their national flag were sunk in violation of international law by the Imperial German Government. Our own ships, flying our own flag and carrying our own citizens, were sent to an untimely, watery grave, and protests sent through diplomatic channels against the murder of our citizens upon the high seas accomplished nothing.

Our Government was notified January 31, 1917, that on the following day unrestricted submarine warfare would be resumed. Diplomatic relations were severed, but we did not go to war in the hope that no further hostile, overt act would be committed.

In the meantime German spies were infesting our country in an effort to poison the minds of the people. They sought to create a sentiment in favor of Germany and to prevent our entering the war. Millions of dollars were used in securing the insertion of paid articles in the metropolitan press. Thousands of acts of sabotage were committed, and hundreds of factories of all kinds were disabled. Bridges and other public structures were blown up to delay transportation. Official intrigues were entered into with our sister Republic on the south. The German Government did everything possible to embroil us in a war with Mexico, in the hope that we should not be able to render effective assistance in the World War.

When war was declared the patriotic sons of America left their homes and joined the colors. Counting the men who entered the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, approximately 4,800,000 responded to their country's call. No other country has such a spirit. It was the American spirit that so largely contributed to the winning of the war. It knows no obstacle and it knows no defeat.

I felt keenly the responsibility placed upon me temporarily by the people of my district. Under the circumstances I deemed it my duty to support all legislation that had for its purpose the winning of the war. We enacted:

First. A law increasing the pay of our soldiers, but everyone knew that the larger pay was not adequate compensation. They can only be fully compensated by the thought that they rendered the finest patriotic service and earned a Nation's gratitude.

Second. A law providing for the dependents left behind. It supplemented the allotment of the soldier who went to the front with an additional amount appropriated from the Federal Treasury.

Third. A law making generous provision for the soldier disabled in the service of our Nation. It is more liberal than the compensation law of any other country. The thousands who made such great sacrifices can not be too tenderly cared for.

Fourth. A law making adequate provision for vocational training and rehabilitation of the men who suffered injuries that make it impossible for them to follow the trades that were pursued by them before the war.

Fifth. A law providing that the soldier might be insured by his Government at a low rate. Insurance rates of private companies were prohibitive for the average soldier who entered the service.

I voted for all of this legislation and for every appropriation recommended as necessary for munitions, food, clothing, and hospital supplies. I voted for every appropriation that would protect the soldier from disease and care for him when wounded.

Upon our entry into the war we soon appreciated that it was necessary to strengthen the defenses of Paris, and when our first troops were sent across the sea that it was essential to forward additional forces rapidly, if victory was to crown our efforts.

They won a glorious victory. We knew in advance that the spirit of America would triumph if we were only able to bridge the seas and transport our men in sufficient numbers to the battle front. Their deeds are known to all the world. At Chateau-Thierry, the St. Mihiel drive, and the bloody struggle in the Argonne Forest they won undying fame. Their gallantry will remain a cherished heritage to all the American people for centuries to come. Last year, on my trip to Europe, I went over these bloody battle fields and saw where our boys fought, struggled, and died. I stood with uncovered head by the graves of many of them. I said to myself that our Government, the greatest, the richest, and the strongest on earth, shall never be ungrateful to the men who rendered such signal service to their country, and particularly to the maimed and wounded, as well as to the dependents of those who made the supreme sacrifice and who now sleep under the poppies of France.

When the subject was being discussed as to the best means of showing our appreciation, I prepared and introduced a bill amending the Federal farm-loan act in February, 1919. I was a member of the Banking and Currency Committee when the Federal farm-loan act was passed, and have been intensely interested in the operation of this law. My amendment made an exception in favor of discharged service men. It extended him a long-time loan, if the soldier wished it, at a low rate of interest, with which to purchase a farm.

When Congress reconvened last summer I redrafted and reintroduced the bill, giving the following privileges: First, a preference right for two years to enter upon any of the public lands of the United States; and, second, the right to apply for a loan of 100 per cent of the value of the property purchased, either in the country or in a city or town. This bill, if enacted into law, would increase production and reduce the cost of living. More farm products would be thrown on the market, resulting in lower prices. It would give employment to the ex-service men. It would show a Nation's gratitude. It would have a tendency to curb unrest. This plan would not have cost the Government anything additional, unless it was for extra employees in the various farm-loan banks where the increased business would require them. I want to encourage every returned veteran to become a home owner.

Many other bills have been introduced and various propositions have been submitted for assisting ex-service men. It was urged that some would not want to buy homes, and would not, therefore, be benefited by the land-settlement provision. The bill now under consideration provides for land settlement; for the purchase of homes on long-time loans at low rates of interest; for vocational training of the soldiers in various trades and sciences; for paid-up insurance in a certain amount; and for adjusted compensation of $1.25 per day for each day of service over 60 days between April 6, 1917, and January 1, 1920. The different options provided are quite generally satisfactory to Members of the House, and, in fact, there was not much criticism of them. It is hoped that the inducements presented in the bill to purchase homes, to take vocational training, and to secure paid-up insurance will so strongly appeal to the young men who have had military training and mental discipline that many of them will be led to take advantage of these provisions.

Assuming that all might select the adjusted-compensation option, it is estimated that it would require $1,800,000,000. This would make it necessary to provide a means whereby additional revenue could be collected. It must be remembered that the funds in the Federal Treasury are replenished by taxes collected from our citizens. It was proposed that part of the money should be raised from a tax on tobacco, some from real estate transfers, a certain amount from stock-exchange transactions, and some from an increase in the income tax. In addition, a sales tax is proposed.

By means of a sales tax it is expected to collect from the people of the country approximately $400,000,000. This tax is indefensible. Of course, it is paid by the consumers. It exempts no one. The washerwoman pays it, although living expenses were never higher. Every woman who purchases a calico dress pays her part. It upsets the whole theory of taxation. It is an extremely annoying tax to collect. No tax is ever a welcome one. In our income-tax law we exempt unmarried men and women who earn less than $1,000 per annum, and married men and women up to $2,000 per annum, with a deduction of $200 additional for each child. Not so with the sales tax, as it passes the tax on to the consumer, just the same as when a show ticket is bought and the war tax is added.

Of course, if this tax is now left in the bill under the guise of aiding the soldier, it will be made a permanent part of our taxation after such need ceases to exist. The soundest theory of taxation is to take into consideration the wealth and the ability of the taxpayer to pay. This sales tax places its hand upon every person and everything and makes no exemptions.

This question should not be a partisan issue. The boys who went to the front did so from every community and from every party. During the World War we laid aside partisanship and no bills were prepared by the majority members of a committee in executive session. The party in power is attempting to make a partisan question of this bill.

It was announced that the bill would be brought up on May 3, and that it was to be passed under a suspension of the rules after 40 minutes of debate, 20 minutes on either side. None of us saw the bill until May 1. It contains 45 pages, providing in very great detail the options I have explained and the method of raising the revenue necessary to carry them out. By bringing it up under a suspension of the rules no amendment could be offered to this important bill. I do not believe that any American citizen indorses this plan. I am sure no ex-soldier can indorse it.

This bill, as every other measure, should be referred to a committee, carefully considered, and reported back for consideration under the general rules of the House, where it could be debated and amendments offered. The Members of the House would then be permitted to vote upon each amendment proposed. The boys did not fight as partisans and we should not legislate in their interest as partisans.

It has also been proposed that the revenue be raised from an additional tax on excess war profits or profiteers or from the sale of long-time bonds, payable solely out of loans, principal and interest, made our allies, which would not further depress the value of our present outstanding bonds. I favor one of these methods in preference to the sales tax. If this bill had been considered on May 3, however, the majority party was maneuvering under a suspension of the rules to prevent a vote to eliminate this objectionable sales-tax provision and the substitution of any other provision.

I am glad to know that not a single post of the American Legion in my district nor a single soldier has written me favoring the sales-tax provision. Every one of them without exception denounces this method of collecting the revenue as unfair. They appreciate that it would have the effect of bringing the soldier himself into criticism. Every small merchant or other person doing business would be required to keep books and make reports at stated intervals. I want to make it plain to the people of the country that the fight over this proposed legislation ranged around the two following propositions:

First. Opposition to the method of considering the bill, whereby only 40 minutes of general discussion was to be permitted. This is a measure of vast magnitude involving $1,800,000,000. The bill is 45 pages long, and no opportunity was to be given for amendment or adopting some other plan of raising the necessary revenue.

Second. The objection to the method of raising the revenue by a sales tax.

The country is proud of our soldiers. They rendered patriotic service of the finest order. They will always live in the hearts of our people. We can not sufficiently reward them. We can not too tenderly care for the disabled, nor can we too generously take care of the dependents left behind. We should approach these questions as patriotic representatives of a great Republic and not from a partisan standpoint. Let us be fair. Let us be just. Let us be generous. Let us be grateful. When civilization was imperiled, these men marched to the defense of humanity under the flag of our country. Let us so shape our legislation that it will be absolutely devoid of any partisan tinge. If we do not, we are unworthy of the brave, patriotic sons of America who left their homes and loved ones, willing to give all that the liberty of the world might be maintained. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For allotment to the various States for the prevention, treatment, and control of venereal diseases, $450,000; and the unexpended balance on June 30, 1920 (approximately $300,000), of the appropriation heretofore made for this purpose is continued and made available during the fiscal year 1921: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be allotted to any State unless such State, in a manner satisfactory to the board, shall have complied with, and shall have given assurance of continued compliance with, the conditions and regulations governing such allotments and the expenditures that may be made therefrom.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph. If I understood the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, when he was explaining the previous paragraph to which the point of order was made, it does not include the continuation of this work beyond the two-year period, but only contemplates perhaps the possible extension of the work relating to military protection or protection of the military and naval personnel, and it seems to me that under that statement the act to which he referred——

Mr. GOOD. The military act provides for this very service, and during the past year, I will say to the gentleman, for example, the State of Massachusetts has been one of the largest recipients under this fund, receiving $36,000 and asking for more, and Texas comes next.

Mr. WALSH. I think if that is so I shall make the point of order——

Mr. BEE. Why, because Texas comes next?

Mr. WALSH. That this particular provision is not authorized by law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. It continues an appropriation of approximately $300,000 in addition to a new appropriation of $450,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to state to the gentleman I do not believe in all these cooperation appropriations, and since the Chairman of the committee has held that the hygiene board was in order then under section 4 of the original act this appropriation would be in order, because it says that it is the duty of that particular State to investigate the cause, treatment, and prevention of venereal diseases; to cooperate with State boards or departments of health for the prevention and control of such diseases within the State; and that makes clear the duty of that particular cooperation; and while I would like for the whole thing to go out——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman contend that the creation of a board to cooperate with a State is an authorization to pay money to the State?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, it seems to have been so held, but I was of the other opinion, and I think the whole appropriation is out of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We create a board of the Federal Government to cooperate with the State, and does that mean that we authorize that an appropriation be given to the State? Giving money to the State is not cooperation with them; that is just giving.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am inclined to think that the gentleman is entirely correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not see where there is any authority in this law for any appropriation to be paid to the State beyond the original appropriation, and it certainly can not be done without authority of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The provision in chapter 15 which has heretofore been referred to and which alone could sustain this appropriation, if it can be sustained at all, is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized and directed to adopt measures for the purpose of assisting the various States in caring for civilian persons whose detention, isolation, quarantine, or commitment to institutions may be found necessary for the protection of the military and naval forces of the United States against venereal diseases.

The Chair thinks that very clearly does not authorize the allotment of funds to States to be spent by them in their discretion for the prevention of venereal diseases. The other provision the Chair has in mind is section 4 of that chapter, which provides:

SEC. 4. That the duties of the Division of Venereal Diseases shall be in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, (1) to study and investigate the cause, treatment, and prevention of venereal diseases; (2) to cooperate with State boards or departments of health for the prevention and control of such diseases within the State—

And so forth.

Now, if this appropriation can be sustained at all it must be under that provision. The Chair does not think that an authority given to a Government board to cooperate with a State board or department of health is an authorization for an appropriation to be allotted to a State board to be expended by the State board in its discretion. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing pending, the Chair will state to the gentleman. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment to universities, colleges, and other suitable institutions, for scientific research for the purpose of discovering more effective medical measures in the prevention and treatment of venereal diseases, $85,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph; and, for the sake of getting along faster, to include the second, which involves the same principle. Both are subject to the construction the Chair has just announced.

In addition to that there is no mention in the original act of creating a hygiene board. It does not even come within the duties of that board to cooperate with these colleges and universities throughout the country. It is nowhere prescribed in that act. It is clearly out of order in this bill as new legislation and there is no law on the statute books authorizing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment to universities, colleges, and other suitable institutions and organizations for the purpose of discovering and developing more effective educational measures in the prevention of venereal diseases, $250,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is no authorization of law for the paragraph, and therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the respective sums contained in the two preceding paragraphs shall be paid to any university, college, institution, or organization which does not set aside an additional sum for the same purpose at least equal to twice the amount to be received from the United States.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike that out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paragraph just read will be disagreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, $1,015,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the total is radically wrong now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the Clerk has been authorized to correct the totals.

The Clerk read as follows:

Valuation of property of carriers: To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to carry out the objects of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof," by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities, approved March 1, 1913, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, and including not exceeding $20,000 for rent of buildings in the District of Columbia, $1,750,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be available for rent of buildings in the District of Columbia if suitable space is provided by the Public Buildings Commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state that the progress made by this commission in carrying out this work is such as to lead us to hope that it will soon be completed?

Mr. GOOD. The field work is practically completed. It was the opinion of Judge Prouty that the entire work of valuation will be completed some time during the next year. On quite a number of the roads the surveys have been made, and they have all their figures. It has been because of certain conditions imposed by the transportation act making a little difference of computation in what they had been making before. But that is largely the work here in the office and will not involve additional field work.

Mr. WALSH. Now, does the gentleman mean that the field work, which was done several years ago, when values were lower than they are to-day, has been brought up and readjusted so that it is upon the same basis as the work done in the last few months?

Mr. GOOD. My recollection is that all calculations are based on the valuation of January 1, 1916.

Mr. WALSH. How much of a task will it be to bring that up to date after all the statistics have been gathered?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know to just what extent the commission will bring that work to date—that is, to readjust to the changing conditions because of high prices. My recollection is that it was that statement of Judge Prouty that the valuation of property would be on the basis of valuation as of January 1, 1916. Now, of course, a great deal of the equipment and the additions and betterments that have been obtained since that time are costing considerably more money, but I take it that because of the fact that most of that work was done by the Government those figures would be available.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state what will have been expended for this work when this $1,750,000 is expended?

Mr. GOOD. Something like $21,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the motion to strike out.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Why is it necessary to spend so much money for rent of buildings? I find scattered through this—even if it is not in this bill, it is in others—there are $140,000 on two pages, when we have got acres and acres of space down here that is not occupied.

Mr. GOOD. We provide that it shall not be used if available space can be obtained from the commission.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Well, you know it will not be.

Mr. GOOD. That is a congressional commission, composed of Members of the House and of the Senate. You will have to take it up with the members of that commission. They are Members of the House and Senate.

Mr. GARNER. Who are they?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], and Senators SMOOT and SWANSON are members of that commission. It is their duty under the act of Congress to allocate this space as long as it is available. Now, they find during the present year that there was no vacant space, and had to rent.

Mr. GARNER. How does the gentleman account for the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR] that there are "acres and acres of vacant space" and the statement of the commission that there is no space available?

Mr. GOOD. In some of these places there are long-term leases, and I hope the Government will continue to pay its obligations. When it enters into a lease at all, I hope it will pay its obligations, whether it has use for the space or not.

Mr. MACGREGOR. But the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations ought to take judicial notice of the fact, ought he not, that there are buildings down here that are practically unoccupied, with a great amount of space that is occupied by individuals spread out who could be jammed together somewhat? Now, after we have got some of these clerks out of there there ought to be some economy along that line.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all authorized expenditures under the provisions of the act of February 17, 1911, "to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," and amendment of March 4, 1915, extending "the same powers and duties with respect to all parts and appurtenances of the locomotive and tender," including such stenographic and clerical help to the chief inspector and his two assistants as the Interstate Commerce Commission may deem necessary, and for per diem in lieu of subsistence when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, $290,000.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee how much additional money is necessary for this commission to carry out the duty of determining the amount of the claims of the various railroads under the transportation act, and also for investigating the question of the increase of rates under the transportation act? How much additional is required for that purpose? Can the gentleman answer?

Mr. GOOD. My recollection is that the estimate was around $600,000 for the work connected with the general expenses of the commission and $300,000 on the carriers' account.

Mr. McKEOWN. That much increase is made necessary in order to determine the claims of these railroads against the United States accruing during the time they were under Federal control?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. And also for determining the question of increased transportation rates?

Mr. GOOD. That would include the guaranty for the six months' period under the transportation act, and other provisions carried in the transportation act. It was not all with regard to that other matter.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is approximately the amount?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the chairman what provision, if any, has been made for the settlement or disposition of claims against the telephone and telegraph lines while they were under Government supervision?

Mr. GOOD. None. I think the Postmaster General has caused an estimate for a deficiency to be transmitted to Congress calling for $14,500,000 as a deficit growing out of the Federal control and operation of the telegraph, telephone, and cable lines.

Mr. BLANTON. Some of the attorneys in my district are writing me, and some have even wired me, as to how they should proceed. They are up in the air. They do not know whether to file a claim or to bring a suit against the telephone and telegraph lines themselves or against the Government agent for the recovery of claims incurred during the time the Government had the wires under its control.

Mr. GOOD. Of course, the Postmaster General was the official in charge, and I would suggest to the gentleman that he get the information from that source as to the method of procedure. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For scientific research, technical investigations, and special reports in the field of aeronautics, including the necessary laboratory and technical assistants; traveling expenses of members and employees; office supplies, printing, and other miscellaneous expenses, including technical periodicals and books of reference; equipment, maintenance, and operation of research laboratory and wind tunnel, and construction of additional buildings necessary in connection therewith; maintenance and operation of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle; and purchase, maintenance, and operation of one passenger-carrying motor cycle; personal services in the field and in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for clerical, drafting, watchmen, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $50,000; in all, $200,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I find myself torn by conflicting emotions in regard to this paragraph. As a friend of aeronautics and desiring to see the Government continue the development along this line in every direction possible, I should favor reasonable appropriations for the purposes set out in this paragraph. On the other hand, I regret to see appropriations that were large during the war increased in amount in the years succeeding the war.

I find that the amount carried in this item in the sundry civil bill a year ago has been increased by $25,000, and that the amount that can be expended for clerical, drafting, watchmen, and messenger service for the year has been increased by $7,000. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill for an explanation of this.

Mr. GOOD. This is an organization that has been making a scientific study of aeronautics. My own opinion is that for every dollar appropriated for this purpose a good many dollars might be taken off from the Army bill for aeronautics. They have simply wasted money by the hundreds of millions for aeronautics in the Army, and the principal reason was that they knew nothing about it and showed a very great disinclination to learn anything about it so far as the science of it was concerned. There are third and fourth rate powers that have done more work with regard to aeronautics from a scientific standpoint than the Government of the United States has done.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman is going to make a political speech we might as well have a quorum here to listen to it.

Mr. GOOD. I am not going to make a political speech. I am simply stating the actual facts with regard to this case.

One of the best things that was done was to provide for this National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. There are on this committee a representative of the Army; a representative of the Navy; Dr. Stratton, of the Bureau of Standards; and Dr. Walcott, of the Smithsonian Institution. Men are detailed from the Army and the Navy to cooperate in this scientific investigation. They asked for $437,000 for scientific investigation, and the men on this board feel that the place for the Government of the United States to spend its money now and in the immediate future with regard to aeronautics is, first, in finding out the principles governing aeronautics, and that is what they are trying to do. I think they are doing splendid work, and the increase of $25,000 here, it seems to me, is a very slight increase when they were asking for an increase of $262,000. The things they desired were things that they felt were absolutely essential.

Now, I submit to the gentleman that the question is a scientific one. I know very little about aeronautics. I was satisfied that they did need, for instance, a motor cycle to trail the aeroplane when it was being tried.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. The time does not belong to me.

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACGREGOR. If a motor cycle is needed, why do they not get it from the War Department, which has a large number of them at Camp Holabird?

Mr. GOOD. That is what the law requires them to do.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It does not say so.

Mr. GOOD That is the law already.

Mr. TILSON. I did not intend to go into the details of the item, but into the principle involved. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] say that this committee for the development of aeronautics is doing a good work, because I think that its members have the right idea, and that they are proceeding along the right line if they insist that those who produce aeroplanes shall know what they are doing before they expend great sums of money in the production of planes and engines not designed or constructed upon sound principles. One of the troubles during the war was that we proceeded to expend vast sums of money along untried lines before determining the scientific basis upon which to expend the money. As a result, much of it was lost. In both the Army bill and the Navy bill there is a considerable sum carried for the purpose of experimentation in aviation. Of course we wish that to go on, but we do wish to have it go on scientifically and not have the money wasted. If this is the bureau in which to do this work—and I am inclined to think it is—then the experimentation should be done under the appropriation carried in this bill along scientific lines. Without doubt much of the money we have spent for the development of aeronautics in both the Army and the Navy has been practically wasted. The right kind of work done under this appropriation ought to do much toward preventing such waste in the future.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment to ask the gentleman if these commissioners are not men who already hold official positions under the Government?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If we are paying them adequate salaries for the work they are supposed to do as the heads of departments, how can they have the time to make scientific investigations along these very important lines?

Mr. GOOD. There are more commissioners than I at first had in mind. There is Mr. Walcott, chairman; Mr. Stratton, secretary; Joseph S. Ames, Thurman H. Bane, Capt. T. T. Craven, William F. Durand, J. F. Hayford, Charles F. Marvin, Maj. Gen. Menoher, Michael I. Pupin, Rear Admiral D. W. Taylor, and Orville Wright. They are members of the commission, and none of these men who are commissioned officers or other officials of the Government who receive salaries draw any salary out of this appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that, of course.

Mr. GOOD. It is an advisory commission of scientific men, and under them are detailed officers from the Army and the Navy who have the ability to carry on scientific research.

Mr. WALSH. I do not wish to reflect on the learned gentlemen comprising this commission, but I venture the assertion that if it were confined to the last three names—to Gen. Menoher, Admiral Taylor, and Orville Wright—we would get just as valuable information and just as practical information and a little less science, and it would be of more benefit to the service and the Government which is going to use this system of aviation and aeronautics in the future. How much has this appropriation been increased?

Mr. GOOD. The amount carried in 1919 was $200,000, this year $175,000, and we carry in this bill $200,000.

Mr. WALSH. What is the necessity for the increase?

Mr. GOOD. There are quite a number of things that they asked the committee for.

Mr. WALSH. They do not include in their duties any investigation as to what became of the $680,000,000 that was appropriated, do they?

Mr. GOOD. No; I think not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, at one time I was somewhat informed in regard to the activities of the National Advisory Committee on Aeronautics. I never was fully persuaded that the work done was all of it of prime importance, but I have no doubt but what the scientific gentlemen composing that committee will do some good work. I am very much in hopes that we will get value received out of that appropriation.

But in this connection, while we are discussing the advisability and necessity and warrant for an increase by $25,000 of the appropriation for this particular class of work, I want to call attention to the fact that the naval bill recently passed the Senate with an increase of $12,000,000 for aeronautics. It passed this House with an appropriation of $15,000,000, the same amount carried in the Army bill, but the Navy, of course, could not be expected to be satisfied with the measly sum as they state the Army received for this sort of enterprise, and so they raised the ante by the sum of $10,000,000—a small and inconsequential sum in the opinion of gentlemen who are interested in this class of work and who believe that a large part of the national income should be spent for that purpose.

I am willing to accept the judgment of this committee as to the advisability of adding $25,000 to this appropriation, but I do hope that when the naval bill reaches us we will, all of us and without exception, take a position in opposition to the increase of $10,000,000 for aeronautics carried in the naval bill.

Take all of our appropriations for this purpose—the Army, the Navy, the sundry civil bills—without any increase above those carried in the bill as they passed the House, and we will spend directly and indirectly for aeronautics in the neighborhood of $50,000,000. That ought to be enough for the advancement of this science for one year in times when we are trying to save the people's money. I hope this increase in the naval bill along with sundry and divers other increases will not be agreed to by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the commission created by section 22 of the public buildings act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats. L., p. 885), to continue proceedings toward the acquisition of lands required for a connecting parkway between Potomac Park, the Zoological Park, and Rock Creek Park, $200,000, to be available until expended and to be payable one-half out of the Treasury of the United States and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the total area of lands finally to be acquired for said parkway shall not exceed the area and parcels described and delineated in the map No. 2, contained in House Document No. 1114 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, except that the following parcels outside the said taking line shall be included, namely, 315 feet of lot 801, 398½ feet of lot 54, 5,035 feet of lots 39, 40, 41, 42, and 43, lots 826, 827, and 828, containing 4,915 feet, and lots 36, 37, and 38, containing 6,983 feet in square 2544; and lots 819, 820, 19, and 20, containing 10,626 feet, part of lots 21, 814, 815, 816, 817, and 45, containing 10,290 feet, and lots 46, 822, and 821, containing 9,146 feet, in square 2543, in all, 47,708.50 feet: Provided further, That the expenditure of the funds appropriated herein shall be subject to all the conditions imposed by the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 1, 1916.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Why is it necessary, with the condition of the Treasury as it is, to enlarge the parks of Washington and go into this increase of acreage to make more expense for the Government to keep up?

Mr. GOOD. This is a work that was started a number of years ago, as the gentleman knows. They have purchased now about 41 acres of ground at less than the assessed value of the land. Does the gentleman have reference to the new authorization?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes; why is it necessary to go ahead with this? Why not let that work rest for a while?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to explain that I think by a map. The matter was presented to the committee by Col. Ridley. This map will show the situation. When the original survey was made, mistakes were made with regard to the contour of the land. It is proposed to buy this tract that is marked "A" and the tract marked "B," so as to permit the location of the road as indicated by this pink colored strip here. If this land is not purchased, then the road must be located farther down into Rock Creek Park, and to do that the contour of the land is such at both of those places that it will be necessary to make extensive fills and also to build extensive retaining walls. The expenditure estimated for the land is much smaller than the cost of the retaining wall and fill.

The land so far has been purchased at considerably less than the assessed value. The assessed value of the land in this area marked "A" is $17,744 and in the area marked "B" is $6,763. It was estimated that to build the retaining wall and make the fill that would be necessary to locate that road, if this land was not secured, would cost in the neighborhood of $60,000 or more. The matter was presented to the committee with other matters with regard to purchase, but it seemed to the committee that this was a business proposition that ought to commend itself to the business judgment of every Member of the House. Inasmuch as that road is to be located, authority ought to be given to purchase the land before any work is done toward building a retaining wall or making the fill.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does not the gentleman think that $200,000 appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section might well have been saved, even granting that the purchase of the land would be good business? Does not the gentleman think that this appropriation ought to be deferred?

Mr. GOOD. The committee considered that matter. We cut the estimate from $400,000 to $200,000. The appropriation last year was $250,000. Col. Ridley said it was absolutely necessary in order to pick up the land before houses were constructed upon it, when they could buy it for much less than the assessed value, and that they ought to have a fund available. It would have been far more economical if years ago, when this land could have been purchased for a few cents a foot, we had purchased it. The committee was not unmindful of the demands on the Treasury, and it was only to prevent speculation in the land and to pick it up when opportunity was afforded to pick it up at a fair price that we have recommended this appropriation. To purchase all of the land that it is intended to purchase under the act of Congress authorizing the purchase would require several hundred thousand dollars in excess of what we have appropriated. We have appropriated only what the committee felt was the minimum in order to permit the commission to go along in a businesslike way, only purchasing those tracts where the land was offered at a very reasonable price.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. There have been some recent improvements in the vicinity of these areas that are proposed to be purchased. Have none of them been on either of the areas proposed to be purchased?

Mr. GOOD. No; not on either of those tracts.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCY SHIPPING FUND.

The authorization of $2,764,000,000, heretofore established for the construction of ships, is reduced to $2,664,000,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD: Page 43, lines 11 and 12, strike out "$2,664,000,000" and insert "$2,614,000,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, that is simply to reduce the authorization of that amount and still leave a margin of safety over present contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

FRIDAY, May 7, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, by Thy grace alone can we achieve that greatness which is worthy of us as a Nation. Thou hast given to us marvelous resources, Thou hast instructed us through a wonderful history, and Thou dost inspire us with great ideals for the future. We turn to Thee that we may learn the way of life, and having learned the lesson from communion with the Father, that our spirits may go forward with the assurance that Thou hast a place for us worthy of the greatest nation in the earth. Help us to perform our duties as in Thy sight. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SNYDER, Mr. ELSTON, Mr. RHODES, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. HAYDEN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that Mr. SINCLAIR and Mr. GANDY were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 400) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims in the place of Mr. ELSTON and Mr. CARTER, respectively.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11960) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PORTER, Mr. ROGERS, and Mr. FLOOD managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2528. An act to grant certain lands to the city of Pocatello, State of Idaho, for conserving and protecting the source of its water supply;

S. 3016. An act to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes; and

Monday, May 3, 1920.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this is a very important measure and possessed of some unique features. It is a bill to protect the dye industry by the imposition, in addition to the existing duties which were enacted into law in 1916 for its benefit, of an embargo upon certain importations of dyes and dyestuffs for a period of three years after the enactment of the law, and, as far as I am informed, it is the first bill of the sort which invokes that weapon for the purpose of protection. The duties imposed by the bill as passed by the House, which the Senate committee rejected, and upon which the House will undoubtedly insist should the Senate take favorable action, increase the ad valorem rates by about 50 per cent and the specific rates even to a greater degree.

Another unique feature of the situation is the message of the President of the United States on the 20th day of last May, who took occasion to recommend the protection of the dye industry because of its great importance in times of war, which the future may develop, and in which event certain by-products of the industry will become of great importance. On that occasion, and about the time or immediately before the signature of the treaty at Versailles, and which, from the President's standpoint, was designed to secure an enduring peace, he advised the Congress that—

> Among the industries to which special consideration should be given is that of the manufacture of dyestuffs and related chemicals. Our complete dependence upon German supplies before the war made the interruption of trade a cause of exceptional economic disturbance. The close relation between the manufacturer of dyestuffs, on the one hand, and of explosive and poisonous gases, on the other, moreover, has given the industry an exceptional significance and value. Although the United States will gladly and unhesitatingly join in the program of international disarmament, it will, nevertheless, be a policy of obvious prudence to make certain of the successful maintenance of many strong and well-equipped chemical plants. The German chemical industry, with which we will be brought into competition, was, and may well be again, a thoroughly knit monopoly, capable of exercising a competition of a peculiarly insidious and dangerous kind.

Whether the President would approve of a bill like that reported from the committee I am unable to say, but it would surprise me exceedingly if, as the representative, in the highest office within our gift, of that great party traditionally devoted to the principle of a tariff for revenue only, he would sanction the use of the embargo whereby prohibitory war conditions are to be continued in favor of one industry in this country, for the period of three years in any event and indefinitely if the industry is subsequently able to convince Congress of the need for its prolongation.

I do not think a bill imposing an overburdensome duty upon a given article of American manufacture and invoking the exercise of the embargo power in addition ever before had the support of the senior and ranking Democratic member of the Finance Committee, together with that of the Democratic leader. Nor do I believe, Mr. President, that any such measure was ever presented at a time when the turmoil and disturbance created by the greatest war in history still prevails throughout the civilized world.

Such are some of the unusual features which attend the consideration of this bill and which are defended, first, upon the principle that the industry is an infant one and needs this added protection; and, secondly, that the threat of impending German competition will materialize in the very near future, in which event without this added protection the infant will be strangled in its cradle.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator being himself a member of the Committee on Finance, which reported this bill, which he justly describes as a most remarkable one, I would like to ask the Senator, without wishing in any way to have him disclose anything which might be confidential with relation to the deliberations of the committee, why such a marked differentiation was made by the Finance Committee between the dye industry and the magnesite industry?

If the Senator will permit me to point out briefly, the dye industry existed in some magnitude in this country prior to the war. The magnesite industry had no existence whatever in the United States prior to the war. Magnesite was quite as essential to war processes and the success of the war as the dyestuff, and yet, in dealing with the magnesite industry, which had been created ab initio because of war necessities and because of war conditions, the committee contented itself with placing what seems to me a very moderate tariff upon magnesite, and insisted upon the absolute embargo for dyestuffs.

If the Senator from Colorado can, without doing violence to the confidences of the inner recesses of the Finance Committee, enlighten the Senate as to the reason for that differentiation, I would like to have him do it.

Mr. THOMAS. I must refer my friend from New Hampshire to the testimony which the committee received in support of the dye bill, and also that which it received to sustain the magnesite bill. I do not recall that the magnesite people asked for an embargo. I am not prepared to say whether it would have been granted or refused if they had done so. But it is perhaps a fair inference to say that the magnesite people got no more than they asked for. Had they been less modest and asked for the extension of the embargo to their industry they might have gotten it; I do not know. I know of nothing which occurred in the hearings at any time during the consideration of this and kindred bills of which the Senate should not have first-hand knowledge to the fullest extent.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I think the Senator from Colorado missed the point of my inquiry, inasmuch as the hearings, of course, are accessible to any Senator.

After the hearings had concluded and after all the testimony had been taken, the committee, of course, must have deliberated. There was conflict of opinion in the testimony taken before the committee with reference to the dyestuffs bill. There were those who advocated an embargo. As a matter of fact, the president of the largest concern engaged in the production of dyestuffs in the United States, in answer to a question which he propounded to himself, "What do we want?" frankly said to the committee, "We want, first of all, an embargo wall erected; and, in case that wall might leak at some point, behind that we want a secondary defense of tariff protection."

Of course, Mr. President, there were those who appeared before the committee who must have dissented; indeed, from my recollection of the testimony, there was dissent from that point of view, and the committee must have pursued some form of reasoning, some method of logic, which produced the result as between the two commodities of which I have been speaking.

I wish to make it perfectly clear, Mr. President, that I have no desire to force the secrets of the inner heart of any member of the Committee on Finance, but it certainly seems to me, as a distinguished old friend of mine in northern New Hampshire would say, "mysticious" that the committee has taken the diametrically opposite point of view between the two commodities, and this information I am trying to extract, with extreme difficulty and slight result, from the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a further interruption?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply rise in the interest of accuracy. I object to having the RECORD cumbered with a protest of the character that there was some secret about the operations of the committee. All the hearings were in the open, they were published, and I think, contrary to the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], that there was considerable dye industry in this country prior to the war; they also showed that there was practically no dye industry in this country prior to the war.

Mr. THOMAS. As regards the last statement of the Senator from New Jersey, I shall attempt to show that a very formidable dye industry, prosperous and profitable, flourishing under the tariff act of 1916, and self-supporting at the time we entered the war, had been fully established in America.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. I wish to trespass upon the time of the Senator from Colorado only for the purpose of saying that I think the Senator from New Jersey must have misunderstood my language, though I tried to choose my words with extreme care. I said nothing about the secrecy of the hearings. I said, indeed, that those are accessible in printed form to everyone, but I said there was a conflict in the testimony introduced in the hearings, and I wondered by what process of reasoning the committee managed to reach the result it did.

Mr. THOMAS. It may possibly comfort my friend from New Hampshire to know that I voted adversely on all these measures. I am unable, of course, to give him any information as to the facts or the arguments which convinced the majority of the committee that it should approve the bill as reported from the subcommittee, except in so far as the deliberations were held which I attended. The embargo was placed upon the dye industry because it was asserted by its proponents to be essential to its welfare and existence, but no such representation was made in my presence by the representatives of the magnesite industry.

The Senator may not have read it, but he will be entertained, if not instructed, by reading the speech of the Democratic leader of the House minority when the tungsten bill, the magnesite bill, and the pearl-button bill came before that body. Among other things he said that the dyestuffs bill having been introduced with probable favorable consideration, every other majority member of the Ways and Means Committee determined to demand similar protection for some industry in which his State was interested, and therefore took advantage of the situation to introduce a bill for the protection of some other so-called war industry which had sprung full-panoplied into existence, due to the prohibitory action of the war, and which had become essential and indispensable to the people of the United States if they wanted to be a self-contained nation both in times of peace and in times of war. Hence the Member from my State, Mr. TIMBERLAKE, introduced a bill for the protection of tungsten, some other Representative from the Southwest introduced a bill for the increase of the duties upon zinc, and still another upon magnesite, and so on.

The committee member from Iowa, not to be outdone in this exhibition of legislative generosity to the industries of their particular sections, conceived the idea that the pearl-button industry was a war industry and introduced and succeeded in securing the passage by the House of a bill largely increasing the duties upon that very humble and indispensable article of commerce, tending to our comfort in times of peace and to our defense in times of war.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I think, if the Senator will permit me for a moment, that the embargo upon the pearl button at this time is quite as necessary for its protection as the embargo which this bill contains, but which is confined in its application to dyestuffs. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. What the Senator from Colorado has said seems to me to imply a reproach to those Senators and Representatives from other States where other industries flourish that have not been looked out for in the same manner.

Mr. THOMAS. Far from it.

Mr. MOSES. If I may trespass upon the Senator's time, I take it as a reproach to myself, because there happens to be in my State an industry, small but highly necessary, the manufacture of tailors' needles, without which the armies of the Republic in the war would have found themselves dependent upon Red Cross knitting for their comfort. What the Senator has said about the activity of other Senators and Members who were looking out for special industries in their own States I take to myself, and if the Senator does not reproach me I certainly reproach myself for my remissness.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator should not reproach himself. All he has to do is to draw an amendment for the protection of that commodity which is produced in his State and put it on this bill.

Mr. MOSES. I thank the Senator for that suggestion, and I shall take it seriously to heart.

Mr. THOMAS. The bills to which I have referred illustrate the fact that upon the tariff question the people of the United States, and particularly the Members of the two Houses of Congress, are divided into three classes. There is the high protectionist, the tariff-for-revenue-only man, and the spotted protectionist; and I am sorry to say that the spotted protectionist flourishes on the Democratic side. They are left-handed philanthropists, who believe in a lower duty upon their neighbors' commodities, but demand full protection for those in which they or their constituents are interested.

I receive letters frequently from people in my State, some in reproach, some by way of resentment, others written more in sorrow than anger, and still others more in anger than sorrow, demanding that I support the tungsten bill even though I give the rest of them "hail columbia." Unfortunately I am unable to do this. My mentality is so constructed, my intellectual make-up so narrow, that I am unable to advocate the application of a great general principle of legislation and at the same time demand exemption for something that happens to be favorable, perhaps indispensable, to my State or to some of my own constituents.

Proceeding now to a consideration of the bill, I think I stated that the measure is sustained first by its infant and undeveloped nature or character, its indispensable necessity as an industry contributing to our national defense, and also because peace having brought a revival of German competition, the industry can not survive that competition without further protective legislation.

Mr. President, I shall attempt as best I can to demonstrate that those positions are untenable, and that neither has any basis in actual fact, either past or present, and that the imposition of those duties and this embargo will inevitably lead to the establishment of another great monopoly in the United States, a key industry to the manufacture of textile fabrics, and ultimately place those great departments of American industry and production at the mercy of this monopoly. If I can do this, then I indulge the hope that the measure will not appeal to the good sense and patriotism of this body.

Mr. President, the dye industry of America was practically without existence in 1913. Several feeble efforts had been made to establish it, but, being opposed by the manufacturers of fabrics, who naturally wanted to secure their raw materials as cheaply as possible, no sufficient protection could be obtained from the American Congress. The so-called dye men applied in vain to the framers of the Wilson bill, the Dingley bill, the Payne-Aldrich bill, and the Simmons-Underwood bill for a measure of adequate protection for their industry, and on each occasion the amount demanded and said to be essential to the establishment of the industry was denied. The rates fixed by the Underwood bill were those fixed by the Payne-Aldrich bill. My impression is that the Simmons bill reduced the rates in some particulars, but they were restored, so as to be substantially those then in existence, by the committee of conference; and the bill passed in that form.

One of the proposed beneficiaries of this measure, engaged in the manufacture of dyes in a limited way, is said by some of the witnesses coming before our committee to have confederated with the owners of textiles and with the German interests to prevent the granting of adequate protection to the industry.

As a result Germany, perfecting the industry through long years of experimentation and manufacture, dominated the world and furnished to the dye men and the textile manufacturers of all countries by far the greater part of their dyestuffs, sending to America some thirty or thirty-five thousand tons per annum, yielding a revenue of about $15,000,000.

Just here let me say, lest I forget it, that the dye industry of the United States last year exported in value more dyestuffs than America ever bought from Germany.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean in the same length of time?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, per annum; the same relative length of time. I will come to that later.

When Germany declared war upon France and England and the British fleet placed an embargo—which was an absolute prohibition—upon the exportation of German articles of commerce, the textile industry in the United States found itself confronted by a very serious situation, so serious, indeed, that Count von Bernstoff, observing its importance, suggested that a sustained embargo on dyestuffs would throw some 4,000,000 men out of employment; and his message, by the way, is one of the bases for this bill. It was referred to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], having charge of the bill, on the 1st of March, at considerable length.

The situation was serious, and, of course, it gave an impetus to the industry, because the most perfect and absolute protection in the world was the Great War then pending. Dyestuff establishments began to spring up over the country, two or three of them of considerable dimensions, notably the Schoelkopffs at Buffalo. They began to supply the cheaper and more generally used dyestuffs—the browns and the blacks and other of the commonest colors—in considerable quantity. Of course they received the encouragement and cooperation of the manufacturers of cloths, woolen, silk, and cotton, all over the country, which must have dyestuffs of some sort. Vegetable indigoes and also logwood came into demand. The industries resorted to every possible method of securing the needed dyes. Some of them learned of a considerable consignment of dyestuffs to China and sent an agent across the Pacific, secured it, brought it back to the United States, and, of course, made a very generous profit out of the enterprise.

Inasmuch as no one could predict the length of the war, and inasmuch as an object lesson of the most striking character was presented to the country, it was quite natural that the representatives of this new industry should come to Congress in 1916 and demand protection. They appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the other House and before the Committee on Finance of the Senate. There they testified at length regarding the nature of the industry, the reasons for its disappearance in America, the need for its reestablishment, both economically and from a military standpoint, and the consequent need of a generous rate of protection. The Finance Committee of the Senate, controlled at that time by the Democratic Party, finally permitted these gentlemen to write their own rates of duty in the bill, which it then enacted into law.

I thought they were very high; I thought they were prohibitive. So thinking, I resigned from the subcommittee having charge of the subject, and was succeeded by the late lamented Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Hughes. That committee finally said to these gentlemen, "We will accept your representations; it is a very serious matter; write your own duties." And they did so, repeating time after time that the rates then written were not only necessary but amply sufficient for the purpose for all time; not for the war—we had not entered it—not for two or three years, but indefinitely. They said, in substance, "Gentlemen, if you will give us this rate of duty, within three or four years we will be able to supply the American market with 80 per cent of its consumption, and when we have the industry thus far advanced, we will fear neither God nor devil; we can beat Germany in her own market; we shall make ourselves the great dye industry of the world under this line of duties." Nay, more, they said, "We agree, after we produce 60 per cent of the home demand for dyestuff, to a reduction of the specific duties which we now ask, graduated through a term of years."

I did not vote for that bill, Mr. President, and did not vote against it, for I felt under the circumstances, much as I regarded the duties as excessive, my duty to the country required that I should resolve the doubt in favor of these gentlemen, realizing to the fullest extent the tremendous importance of the industry. So the bill passed; other dyestuff institutions sprang up in different places; the manufacture of dyes increased, and within 16 months—certainly within 18 months—the American industry was furnishing more than 80 per cent of all the dyes consumed in the United States. As the Senator from Utah suggests to me, they can do it now. Of course, they can; they are doing it now; they are furnishing some 90 per cent and supplying other countries with our exports and even selling intermediates to Germany to enable her to continue her manufacture of dyes.

We took these gentlemen at their word in 1916——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. When the Senator makes the statement that we are producing 80 or 90 per cent of the dyes, does he mean—perhaps I do not express myself accurately—of each particular dye?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. POMERENE. Or the sum total?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; I mean the sum total. There is a certain line of dyes which are intricate in composition and are used for the finer lines of goods, particularly the fast blues in shirtings, and so forth, not now manufactured in this country, and it is because our manufacturers have not yet been able to produce all that class of dyes that Congress is asked to increase the duties and to levy an embargo.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, let me ask a further question of the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the value of the dyes which we do not produce?

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator mean the rate of value?

Mr. POMERENE. The value in money. I wish to get an accurate statement of the quantity and value.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am unable to answer that question. I will go through the records again and see if I can supply the answer. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] may be able to answer, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not intend to ask the Senator from Colorado to yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I gladly yield, because I think the Senator perhaps can answer the question.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I should like to say to the Senator that, taking all of the class of dyes to which the Senator from Colorado has referred as not being made in this country and which never have been successfully made here, although there is a hope that they may be made here at some time in the future—taking them, together with the delicate shades, such as light pinks and light blues, which must be made so that they are fast to scouring and fast to light, as well as other dyes that are not made in this country to-day, I suppose their value would be about fourteen or fifteen million dollars.

I do not know whether the Senator wants any further explanation as to what these dyes are and why they are not made in this country. I think the Senator from Colorado can give that information better than I can.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah to explain, if he will be kind enough to do so, whether he means that $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 represents the total value of dyes of the character he has described as consumed throughout the world or as consumed in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. As consumed in this country. I answered the question of the Senator from Ohio in accordance with the way in which I understood it.

Mr. NUGENT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the hearings held by the subcommittee of the Finance Committee investigating this matter showed conclusively that the value of all dyes imported into this country prior to the war was but $12,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my remarks applied to the question asked by the Senator from Ohio as to the value of the dyes included in the 20 per cent referred to by the Senator from Colorado. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that I understood the Senator from Ohio to ask the value of those dyes at this time. I wish to say that it is true that the total importation into the United States of all dyes before the war was about $12,000,000, but to-day their value if imported into this country would be three or four times that amount; and of that three or four times the amount of $12,000,000, which would be $36,000,000 to $48,000,000, there are $14,000,000 at to-day's prices of dyestuffs that are not manufactured in the country. I think the Senator will agree with me, will he not?

Mr. THOMAS. Surely; surely.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado a moment ago made the statement that as a result of our legislation and world conditions, I take it—I am not using his language—we are producing at the present time between 80 and 90 per cent of the total amount of the dyes which are consumed in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. And that statement is true. I think to-day it is 90 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. That leaves, then, from 10 to 20 per cent of the dyes consumed in this country which are produced abroad; and my question is, what is the value—I mean the commercial value—of that 10 or 20 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. At to-day's prices I will state again that it is about $14,000,000; and the dyes that are imported to-day are the vat dyes spoken of by the Senator from Colorado, and they are mostly colors that are used in gentlemen's shirts, and dyes of that character.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me ask, for further information, what would have been the value of these dyes that we are not producing at the rates prevailing prior to the war?

Mr. SMOOT. Just to speak offhand, without going into a detailed investigation, I should say about $8,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. In other words, they have advanced about 50 per cent. That is, the present values are about 50 per cent greater than the values of those particular dyes prior to the war?

Mr. THOMAS. Over 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that some of them are over 100 per cent higher, but I think the average would be about as I stated—$8,000,000 as against $14,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. The statement of the Senator from Utah was in the main correct; but we are not importing those dyes, because we can not get them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask a further question in order to develop the thought to which the Senator has just given utterance? He says we can not get these dyes. Does he mean that we can not get them because they are not being produced or because of the fact that the treaty with Germany has not been ratified?

Mr. THOMAS. We can not get them because they are not being produced, and because we have not yet been able to get that part of the amount of dyes of that character on hand in Germany, 50 per cent of which were under the treaty to go to the Reparation Commission. I will elaborate that before completing my discussion of this bill.

In consequence of the assurances received from the representatives of the industry in 1916, the Senate inserted section 501 of the revenue act of that year, which I will read:

> That on and after the day following the passage of this act, in addition to the duties provided in section 500, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles contained in Group II a special duty of 2½ cents per pound, and upon all articles contained in Group III (except natural and synthetic alizarin, and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene, and carbazol; natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo; and medicinals and flavors), a special duty of 5 cents per pound.

These specific rates were very much larger at that time, relatively to the price of dyes, than they are at present, although the cost of American dyes in many instances has been very largely reduced—a fact of itself indicating the self-supporting character of the industry.

> During the period of five years beginning five years after the passage of this act such special duties shall be annually reduced by 20 per cent of the rate imposed by this section, so that at the end of such period such special duties shall no longer be assessed, levied, or collected; but if, at the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act, the President finds that there is not being manufactured or produced within the United States as much as 60 per cent in value of the domestic consumption of the articles mentioned in Groups II and III of section 500, he shall by proclamation so declare, whereupon the special duties imposed by this section on such articles shall no longer be assessed, levied, or collected.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, is that one of the provisions which the Senator had in mind a moment ago when he said that it was drawn by the dye people themselves?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not say that this section was drawn by the dye people. I said that the duties carried by that bill were, and the Senate committee drew this section with their consent and approval because of the representations which they made; and the Senator will observe that it is a sort of guaranty that 60 per cent of the market will be supplied in five years. If the guaranty is made good, then the specific duties shall be gradually removed until at the end of 10 years they disappear. If the guaranty is not made good, then, at the end of five years, the President shall wipe out the specific duties entirely.

I take it that when an industry, ably represented, seeking specific beneficial class legislation, comes before the authorized committees of Congress and gives them the assurance that a certain rate of duty is ample for all purposes, and that when under it the industry is able to furnish the home market with 80 per cent of its demands it can then defy competition everywhere, we ought to take its representatives at their word, and particularly when the after assertion of impending overwhelming and destructive competition has no existence outside of their own excited imaginations. The Government has made good; and just here let me say that the beneficiaries of this industry are doubtless patriotic men. I would not for the world cast any imputation upon their loyalty to America, but they did not start this industry from motives of patriotism. We were not in the war then. They saw a splendid opportunity to build up a great and profitable industry, and one thing that we have not been informed of is the amount of profit which they have made since this legislation of 1916 was enacted.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. Is it not true that at the time American capitalists went into the dyestuffs manufacturing business no dyes were being imported into this country in any considerable quantity and that the textile manufacturers of the United States, as a matter of fact, were facing ruin because of the lack of dyes?

Mr. THOMAS. I will not say they were facing ruin. They were badly embarrassed because of the lack of dyes; yes.

Mr. NUGENT. They could not very well get along without them.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. NUGENT. And there was no place from which they could be secured at that time.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true; but in America more than anywhere else necessity is the mother of invention, and they got along somehow. They got logwood. They got a supply of indigoes. A company out in Michigan began to manufacture indigoes in 1915. They were hard run for dyes, unquestionably; and, as I said, for the first time in their lives they united in the effort to establish a dye industry in the United States, and, again, because of the needs of the times. So that when these gentlemen now say that they exhibited a great example of patriotic self-denial and came to the rescue of their country in its hour of need, and therefore should be protected from impending ruin, they do not state all of the facts by any means.

Mr. President, later on I may refer to some extracts from the testimony of 1916 in support of the assertions that I have here made, although I am satisfied that no one identified with the dye industry will deny my recital of the position which was taken in 1916 by the exponents of the industry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Colorado, a short while ago, made an observation that I did not fully understand, and I should be glad to have him explain it to me. Among other things, he said that the bill is defended upon the ground that it is necessary for the national defense. Will the Senator enlarge a moment upon that phase of the matter and give us his view of why it is necessary for the national defense or why it is claimed to be necessary for the national defense?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I intended going into that subject, and I perhaps might as well do it at present, as I can do by rearranging some of my notes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not ask the Senator to readjust his argument.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a very simple matter, and I can do it just as well as not.

I may say generally upon that subject—and I hope I shall be corrected by the advocates of the bill if I misstate anything, either with regard to this or with regard to any other phase of it—that the by-products of coal tar are the foundation of the synthetic dye industry. The by-products of coal tar are also the foundation for many of the deadly gases and explosives used in modern warfare. From the same material used to extract the beautiful and brilliant colors everywhere prevailing in our modern life come also the basic elements of trinitrotoluol, probably the most tremendous explosive thus far developed by the genius of the chemist. The gases which are known generally as mustard gas and phosgene gas and other forms of gas, including chlorine gas—although chlorine is a derivative of other than the products of coal tar, being, in other words, derivable both from coal tar and from other sources of nature—contain in very large degree the same elements that enter into the production of dyes of various colors.

There is, therefore, a very close interrelation between the two industries, and there can be no doubt that the German dye chemists, in making their various combinations to secure other and different colors, evolved the explosive and deadly qualities of some of the ingredients of the crude products of coal tar. Germany, swift to seize advantage of such a condition, utilized her dye industries, encouraged and developed them, for the double purpose of controlling the dye markets of the world and also for establishing a firm and widely developed basis for the production of deadly war material.

It followed, therefore, that the conversion of the dye factory into a manufactory of explosives and of gas was comparatively easy, needing, perhaps, but little change in the mechanisms and staff of employees for the purpose, but in any event making the transformation very easily and very rapidly.

There can be no question, and I have no question, about the interrelation of the two industries with each other, of the two purposes, and of the need, therefore, of the maintenance of the dye industry. My contention is that this bill is not necessary for that purpose.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator from Colorado contend that the existing rates are sufficient to maintain this industry?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly. They are either sufficient or every man who came before us intentionally or unintentionally misled us in 1916.

Mr. WATSON. What has happened since 1916 which confirms the Senator in that opinion?

Mr. THOMAS. Everything. I will come to that. We have an enormous dye industry; as the Senator from Utah suggests, we are supplying 90 per cent of our consumption. We exported last year $17,000,000 worth of dyes.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly I will yield. I always yield to the Senator from Indiana with pleasure.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator. I think 90 per cent is a little high. I think 80 per cent is the right figure.

Mr. THOMAS. I am willing to split the difference between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. But does the Senator maintain that the dye industry has been established because of the tariff rates of 1916?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so entirely.

Mr. WATSON. The war was on, having started in 1914.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly. But the war was on when they came before us with these representations.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true.

Mr. THOMAS. We were not in it, but the source of competition was paralyzed to the same degree by Germany.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true; but, after all, is it not also true that it was then entirely a new business?

Mr. THOMAS. No; not entirely.

Mr. WATSON. Practically, so far as the manufacture of the great body of dyes consumed in this country was concerned, it was a new industry.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WATSON. And they came before us and made their statements wholly hypothetically; they did not know. There was no importation of dyes at that time from Germany. An embargo absolutely prohibited importations, and here was an industry which had not been established and was not on a working basis in the United States; and is it not true that at that time they came and made these statements, based upon no real knowledge of the facts?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we called their attention to the fact that the war operated like an absolutely prohibitive tariff at the time they made this request, and they said, "We know that. We do not need protection now. We want this for our protection when the war is over." That was their position.

I want to be just and I want to be fair. Some of them say they were mistaken. But when you compare the volume of their business, the progress of certain consolidations, and the profit, as far as we can get it, upon capital invested, we must be pardoned if some of us are obliged to accept those assurances with some degree of modification.

Let me say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that a further contention—and this comes from the Army and from the schools—of the absolute need for a self-sustaining dye industry is that it will develop schools for synthetic chemistry, and that we are short of synthetic chemists; that Germany has an ample supply, a great staff, at every one of her centers of the dye industry; and that they are a part of the inevitable development of that industry. Hence, in order to secure a similar staff of synthetic chemists, this industry must be protected by an increased duty and by an embargo, and unless that is done we can not continue our competition, because we will then lack the scientific personal element so essential to the development of the industry.

Mr. CUMMINS. One other question, if the Senator will permit me. The by-products of coal can only be secured when coal is consumed for some other purpose. Is not that true? It is not consumed for the sole purpose of consuming it?

Mr. THOMAS. The by-product is the result of coking, the transformation of the coal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but coal is not coked simply for the purpose of producing a by-product?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the amount of coal that is consumed must depend upon our other industries?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The national defense, therefore, is, after all, involved in the extent of our other industries?

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely. Let me say to the Senator right there that the wool growers, I am told, are now contending that if an embargo is to be given to the dye manufacturers, it should be given to the woolgrowers, because wool is a war industry as well as an industry of peace. A soldier has to be clothed or he can not shoot.

Mr. CUMMINS. When the coal is consumed for the purpose of making coke, that coke must be consumed in some industry, and whether the by-product is gathered or preserved depends entirely upon the form in which the coal is reduced to coke, as I understand it.

Mr. THOMAS. It is also a product of the gas plants which produce artificial gas for municipal consumption.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but the principal purpose is for the production of what we know as water gas.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; hence the term "by-product."

Mr. CUMMINS. The difficulty I have had all the time, being in entire sympathy, I do not say with the bill but with the general purpose of those who framed the bill, is that our industries are running and the coke is consumed, and the by-product necessarily forms but an incidental part in the industry in which the coal may be used. Why is it necessary to attach either an embargo or enormous duties upon that by-product? It must be simply because we have not discovered the means of converting the by-product into dyestuffs.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. That same situation is true in Germany, I will say to the Senator from Iowa. They obtain their dyes from by-products, and these by-products are obtained in coke ovens, as the Senator has well said, and also in the manufacture of gas in municipal plants. That has always been the case. It is so in Germany. We do not put a tariff on that particular by-product. We do not put a tariff on coke for the purpose of establishing a dye industry in the United States, but it is for the purpose of so protecting the industries that they can develop the great chemical industry of the United States. In other words, they have the skilled chemists over there simply because they have been producing the dyes. We have not been producing the dyes, and we have not the chemists, and we have not the knowledge; we do not know the formulæ.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there not any way by which we can ascertain how the Germans make dyes?

Mr. NUGENT. It is being done now.

Mr. WATSON. The Alien Property Custodian, at that time Mr. Palmer, took the patents away from Germany, about 4,200 in number, as I recall, and they were sold in the United States. They had the initial steps of the requisite formulæ, but they did not have all the steps in the production of the dyes. Some important step would be left out, another important step would be omitted, and our chemists from that time to this in the manufacture of these dyes have been attempting to pick up those steps which were lost. So if we had not had the skilled chemists who were developed during the war in this industry, we would not now be making any of these dyes; but it is because we developed those chemists and that chemical knowledge since the embargo was laid by the war, which absolutely prohibited imports, that we have developed that chemical knowledge which has enabled us to make the dyes we are to-day making. We did not do it before the war came; we did not do it before we had this prohibitory tariff which was made by means of the war, and when we go back to prewar conditions we will not do it again if Germany continues to make her dyes and send them into this country in competition with what we make.

Mr. POMERENE, Mr. MOSES, and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to everybody.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to address a question to the Senator from Indiana, if he will permit.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator, if the Senator wants to ask a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I will ask the question later. I ought not to intrude in this debate in that way.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Indiana before this interesting phase of the discussion is passed?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly. I play no favorites. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WATSON. So will I.

Mr. MOSES. I ask the Senator from Indiana if it is not a fact that the visible and readily available supply of coal for the German industries has not been very much curtailed by the results of the war?

Mr. THOMAS. May I say to the Senator that I expect to go into that very fully?

Mr. MOSES. I do not want to trench upon the Senator at all.

Mr. THOMAS (to Mr. MOSES). You are not doing that. Go ahead and ask the question.

Mr. MOSES. In that event, will not the German supply of by-products available for the skilled chemists be very much reduced?

Mr. WATSON. That is partially true, but not altogether true by any manner of means.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator mean to indicate that by some miraculous process in four years we have developed skilled chemists out of nothing? We had a corps of skilled chemists in this country long before the war.

Mr. WATSON. We had a few only. As compared with the great number in Germany, we had comparatively a few. We have developed them in very large numbers and in an amazing manner right in this industry. If the Senator has read the testimony——

Mr. MOSES. I have.

Mr. WATSON. I assume the Senator, when he reads testimony, believes it unless he has reason to dispute it.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, yes.

Mr. WATSON. It is shown there precisely how these chemists have been developed in this industry since the war began.

Mr. MOSES. But if I understand the testimony, these chemists have not been developed in this industry since the war began. They are not the skilled chemists who take the initiative; they are the mechanicians of the chemical industry, who carry on these processes in the laboratories exactly as an operative performs in any factory.

Mr. WATSON. But where do they come from? How are they developed?

Mr. MOSES. From the technical schools, or they may have come up through the works. They may have come from any one of our institutions of learning.

Mr. WATSON. But were they not all developed by the dye industry since the war began?

Mr. MOSES. They found an opportunity in the dye industry, Mr. President, but I think the great bulk of them were on the way toward the pursuit of trained chemical research, because everyone who has paid any attention to the institutions of higher learning in the country knows that with the number of men being graduated in the chemical courses, for chemical engineers and for research chemists, employed as they were in large numbers by the great industrial establishments, there was in this country a corps of men with much more than the rudiments of practical training in these lines long before the war existed.

One small college in my State has been producing men of that character for 20 years, men who have gone out all over the world, to the rubber plantations, to the tobacco plantations in Sumatra and Java, to the jute factories in India. From one small institution in my State men of that character have gone out in the chemical line, and what is true of one little college in New Hampshire is much more true of the greater institutions elsewhere. There are research organizations which were established before the war. Few of them came into being because of the war.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, what the Senator says is partially true, and partially, I think, due to his imagination. I mean by that that a chemist who is qualified to work in a rubber plant has no sort of qualification to work in a dye plant. The dye chemist is sui generis, developed in a dye plant, and can not be developed anywhere else.

We did not have these chemists in the United States before, except in very small number. All the testimony agrees on that point.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield if the Senator from Colorado is willing.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I merely wish to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that Dr. Bogart, who is a chemist of international reputation, testified in the hearings that in order to have the United States build up a staff of great chemists, as Germany has, it would require every Ph. D. man graduated from every college and institution in the country over a period of five years.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this interesting discussion, although interfering with the course of argument I have mapped out, is nevertheless very important and very interesting. I welcome it, because I can refer to the subjects which are brought up without any serious inconvenience to the general arrangement I have made.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Colorado will kindly yield to me once more——

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to state, while the Senator from Indiana is here, the reason for the interruption I made a few moments ago and the question I asked the Senator from Colorado.

After a somewhat long, severe, and heartbreaking struggle in the Republican Party, we finally drifted into the position that we favor—I certainly do—protection upon every commodity that may need it, and the degree of protection ought to be measured by the difference between the cost of producing the article abroad and the cost of producing it at home. That is a sort of protection that I stand for.

Mr. THOMAS. I may say to the Senator that I do not think that element entered into this bill or in the testimony at any direction.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just what I am trying to find out—whether we are proposing to attach something in the nature of protective duties or a tariff for protection to this particular enterprise, based upon the difference between the cost of producing it abroad and at home, or whether we are giving ourselves a breathing spell, if you please, in order to learn how to produce it at all. That is the thing that interests me more than anything else about the bill.

Mr. MOSES. I will say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing to attach to the bill an amendment exactly along the line of the suggestion he has made, and in addition an automatic and further protection of 20 per cent as against any possible form of German competition. But I have been unable to convince the friends of this measure, the proponents of the measure—because I think that there is a good deal of perturbation in the hearts of some of the proponents of the measure as to its really beneficial character—that protection which they propose will be adequate. They evidently are insistent upon an embargo, upon turning our backs upon the fundamental policy of this country in its fiscal relations with industrial development, and of embarking upon an unknown sea.

Mr. WATSON. If my friend from New Hampshire has concluded his description of the terror that pervades the hearts of the proponents of the measure, I should like to respond to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I think even my friend, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is entirely familiar with the proposition and who also is desirous of establishing the dye industry in the United States, would be wholly unwilling to put rates on certain imports that would make them fully protective. In many instances the particular kinds of dye, for instance, the finer shades and tints of dyes, could not be protected by a protective tariff because it would take anywhere from 1,000 to 3,000 per cent to do that. Take the particular color called Rhodamine B, for instance. The Germans sold that to the United States for 41 cents a pound before the war. When we first started to make it we sold it for $75 a pound. You could not have a tariff that would protect that product. It would mean thousands of per cent. But because we developed the chemists and have an industry in which to make that particular kind of dye, it is now selling in America for iess than $10 a pound and we are assured that if the industry is permitted to remain so that there will be no difficulty as to its continuity, we can after awhile produce that dye and all other qualities of dye just as cheaply as they are produced anywhere in the world. I take it for granted that that is true.

While I am on my feet——

Mr. NUGENT. Just a moment at that juncture, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; I yield. I am very sorry, however, that I have aroused this ancient tariff discussion.

Mr. NUGENT. It is generally conceded to be a fact, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, that conditions throughout the world are such at this juncture that it is utterly impossible to ascertain the difference in the cost of production in Germany or in any other European country and in this country at this time.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; and I was about to make that observation. We can not now tell what is the difference in the cost of production between this country and Germany in the manufacture of dyes. We have this incipient industry, and in order to put it on its feet absolutely beyond all peradventure we took this method of doing it until it can stand alone. This is only for three years, you must remember.

If the Senator from Colorado will pardon me further, I wish to go back to the question of chemists. I call the attention of my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], to this statement in the report on the progress of the American dye industry made by the United States Tariff Commission:

> Explanation of the high costs now prevailing is found in two things: (a) The inadequate technical preparation of a sufficient number of men for the staff and labor force in American plants, and (b) the imperfect organization and integration of both the manufacturing and the commercial branches of the business.
> (a) The chemical industry more than any other demands for success the scientific training of the personnel engaged in it. Primarily its development depends on its chemists, who must be highly trained in the fundamental principles of chemical science in order to do creative work and whose training must be supplemented by experience. Much of the work already done and much that remains to be done requires original investigation and research of the most difficult and exacting kind. Previous to 1916 few American manufacturers had any experience in dye making; provision for research in their plants was scarcely more than embryonic; and little study had been devoted to the chemical problems of an industry that had offered no prospect of successful prosecution. Even the seizure of the German patents brought only partial relief, for in them and in other technical literature the description of processes was mostly inadequate and often intentionally misleading. The most urgent need of the industry, therefore, has been, and still remains, the need for chemists. This does not mean that in training and ability American chemists are inferior to the German, but merely that there are not enough of them to meet the situation and that very few are experienced in the particular branch of chemistry involved.

I think that is sufficient answer to that question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the statement which the Senator from Indiana has just read from the hearings, but a moment ago the debate developed that we are producing in this country between 80 and 90 per cent of the entire demands of our industries.

Mr. WATSON. That is, to-day we are.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; and the Senator has made it perfectly clear that we have received, through the Alien Custodian, the patents, and we have during this period developed the necessary chemists whereby, under the processes defined in those patents, we have been enabled to produce the 80 or 90 per cent.

Now, does it not occur to the Senator that if we have been able in this short time to develop the chemists who can produce the 80 or 90 per cent, we can probably produce the chemists who can aid us to produce the other 10 or 20 per cent?

Mr. WATSON. Why did we not do that, let me ask the Senator, before the war?

Mr. POMERENE. We have done it thus far.

Mr. WATSON. Why did we not do it before the war?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know. It takes a little time to do these things. But I am calling attention to the Senator's own statement that we had produced the chemists, and that these chemists have been able to produce the dyes. That leads me to have a good deal of confidence in the ability of American chemists, and I do not believe that it is necessary for us to go to Germany in order to get a chemist who may know something about dyes.

Mr. WATSON. That is all right. Doubtless if we had attempted to establish a protective tariff a dozen years ago, which would have enabled us to establish this industry on a firm basis, the Senator would have taken precisely the position he is taking now.

Before the war we did not make the dyes and did not have the chemists, and after the war, when we get back to prewar conditions, then this competition from Germany will prevent the manufacture of certain types of dyes in the United States. During the war we developed some chemists, but we developed them only because of that prohibitive protective tariff. There could not be any imports at that time. We could not develop the dye industry before the war because of competition, but when we get back to prewar conditions we will have possibly the same competition, and if we could not establish the industry before the war because of competition, when after the war the competition again comes, then our industry will languish.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it the Senator's position that these chemists, even though they should be paid their salaries, will not continue to work if we do not have this—shall I say complete—protection in the form of an embargo?

Mr. WATSON. My contention is that we would quit making dyes because of the competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not know that I can recall, after this somewhat long discussion, just what branch of the subject I was about to elaborate, but I have been given ample material for the remainder of the afternoon.

It is true that one of the reasons assigned for this extraordinary legislation is that it will develop an American school of chemists, and that without it we shall have no such school. If that is true, and I have no doubt the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] believes it to be true, it furnishes the best reason so far advanced for it; but, unfortunately, it will not stand the test of examination. One of the very witnesses who maintained this position before the committee, in the enthusiasm of a particular part of his examination, declared that immediately after we went into the recent war the War Department took up the question of the manufacture of explosives and other material and within a very few days assembled in Washington the finest body of chemists the world ever saw.

Mr. KING. And the gases which we produced verified his assertion.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not use his exact words; I do not remember who it was that made the statement; I will identify him later on; but what he said was true. Dye industry or no dye industry, the chemists of America measured up to the crisis of the war. Mr. President, no finer staff of chemists can be found anywhere than those upon the permanent pay roll of the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it not also true that these chemists in a very short time produced more deadly gases than those which were used in Europe?

Mr. THOMAS. That is true, though the Senator is anticipating me. Not only that, but I will say to the Senator that those gases were not the product of coal tar. In 1918 I had occasion, with other Senators, to visit the great Ford manufacturing establishment in Detroit. There we encountered another staff of engineers, metallurgists, and chemists which Germany, in my judgment, could not duplicate. I am told that the great manufacturers of rubber tires and other rubber goods have each and all a most efficient staff of synthetic chemists; and synthetic rubber is among the possibilities of the future; it is only a question of expense.

No doubt the dye industry develops chemists, but to say that the United States of America with its 110,000,000 people, with the most extensive and diversified industry in the world, must place an embargo upon foreign dyes in order to get chemists for the United States, is simply, Mr. President, to exhibit the paucity of argument upon which this bill can be founded.

Alcohol is an indispensable ingredient of explosives. Every time a 13 or 14 inch gun is fired at least a barrel of alcohol is consumed. Alcohol is as indispensable as anything in the coal industry. Shall we continue to make alcohol in order to develop chemists? The distilleries of the country had their chemists up to the time they were put out of business. It is a remarkable fact, if it be true, that we have no chemists, and yet that the infant dye industry should reach such staggering proportions since 1916, during which time we were in competition with Germany, and consequently could not obtain any chemical information from her.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to know from the Senator from Colorado what percentage of the dye industry of the country is controlled by a few concerns?

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I will come to that a little later on; but I will now say that a very considerable proportion of the industry is so controlled.

During the hearings one witness suggested that, in his judgment, a most essential war measure was the establishment of a Government school of chemistry. That appealed to me very strongly. If we have not a sufficient staff of chemists, and if it be true—as I think it is beyond question—that modern war is an affair of chemistry quite as much as it is of military tactics, then no better appropriation could be made, no more useful institution could be founded, than a great, efficient Government school of chemistry, both analytic and synthetic. Such an institution would cost the people of the United States, Mr. President, a trifle compared to the enormous burden which this bill, should it become a law, will inflict upon the consumers of America.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] announced his conviction regarding the purpose and the basis of a protective tariff; that is to say, if the difference can be ascertained between the cost of the production of a given article abroad and its cost at home, that difference should furnish the standard of legislative procedure. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] took occasion at that time to say—and it is true—that the disturbed industrial conditions of the world are such that it is now impossible to ascertain that cost; and I do not know of a more eloquent reason for defeating this bill than that fact; for we are legislating in the dark, in defiance of every principle of scientific revenue laws and without regard to fundamentals, information concerning which ought to be demanded before the precedent is established in this country of substituting embargoes for protective tariffs.

We know, Mr. President, that there is no considerable production at present in Germany, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding, and we had a great many such statements before our committee, to which I will refer hereafter.

Let me say just here, lest I overlook it, that immediately after the war England and France both laid embargoes upon the importation of German dyes into their borders, believing, as is asserted here, that Germany was possessed of a vast amount of dyes manufactured during the war and intended to flood those countries at its close. Both of those nations have repealed their embargo laws, in the vain effort to secure a needed supply of dyes; and Germany, instead of having an enormous accumulation of 250,000 tons—that being the maximum figure according to the assertions before us—has only 22,000 tons, or 8,000 tons less than the amount of our importations before the war.

Perhaps I might as well state here as anywhere that the dye manufacturers of the United States have an enormously increased protection since our enactment of the law of 1916 through the Government confiscation of all German dye patents now the property of the United States and transferred to the American Chemical Institute under act of Congress, where they are available to the dye manufacturers, and the royalty upon which German dyes would have to meet if they came here manufactured under those patents which we own. The extent of that protection I do not pretend to determine, but that it is very considerable is evidence by the fact that Germany went to the expense of registering them; and there are more than 4,000 of them in the Patent Office at Washington.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator explain a little more fully how that protection arises? I do not get the idea exactly in my mind.

Mr. THOMAS. It is very simple. If the Senator is the owner of a patent upon some useful article I must either buy the patent, the right to work under it, or pay him a royalty—one or the other—or I am guilty of infringement, and, if so, the courts will prevent my manufacturing it at all. So the introduction into this country of a German dye covered by a patent, once theirs, but now ours, can be excluded as infringing that patent, or it can be made to pay the royalty set by the American Chemical Institute. It is perfectly simple. That is what patents are for; and sometimes they are more complete in their protection of a given article than a tariff applying to it. So these gentlemen have not only the tariff which they demanded and which they said was sufficient, but, in addition to that, the benefit of the identical patents which must be utilized by Germany as a competitor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does that mean that if German dyes are brought to this country at this time they are required not only to pay the tariff which is levied by the Government but to pay to the Chemical Institute a royalty?

Mr. THOMAS. If they have set a royalty, yes; otherwise they can be excluded as infringements of our patent rights.

The manufacturers of American dyes were not particularly keen to recognize that situation. Of course, they could not deny it, but they yet contended that it was insufficient. In fact, everything is insufficient except the theory of prohibition.

If I am correct as to that, let us see the extent—and I shall touch upon this subject very briefly—to which we are absolutely dependent upon dyestuffs or coal-tar products for military purposes.

The most deadly gas manufactured by American chemists, whatever its constituents may have been—and I do not know—according to my information is composed of elements for which we are not at all dependent upon coal-tar products. During the war a very able and competent gentleman, a self-educated chemist, a very successful man of affairs, who worked for the Government by day and by night from April, 1917, until November, 1918, at a dollar a year, which he never got, who maintained in this city a staff of assistants at his own expense, evolved from one of the commonest elements of nature an explosive far more deadly than T. N. T. and capable of production at trifling cost. He secured tests of this explosive and they were eminently satisfactory—so satisfactory, indeed, that the doubting were not only convinced but entertained other doubts as to the ability of modern American ordnance to stand up under the terrific impact of the explosive, and he tested that satisfactorily; and while the authorities were passing him from one bureau to another in this infinite and everlasting Washington play of "pass the buck" the war ended. Of course, he has not disclosed and will not disclose his invention, but in the unfortunate event of another war I venture the prediction that his discovery will make present explosives largely obsolete, both because of the intricacy of their manufacture and the cost of their production and the inferior quality of the material.

One of the most intelligent witnesses before the committee was Mr. Wood, who went into this subject at length. On page 262 of the Senate hearings he says:

At the beginning of the war the American dye industry was admittedly of small proportions and of exceedingly narrow development. The manufacture of intermediates was upon so small a scale that it could hardly be classed as a distinct industry.

He refers now to August of 1915.

And it must be remembered that for military purposes it is the production of intermediates, rather than of finished dyes, that is important.

Notwithstanding this situation of chemical unpreparedness the outstanding fact relating to the supply of war munitions is that there was never at any time any lack of explosives.

That is a very broad statement.

Indeed, explosives were almost the only important munitions of which we had quantity production almost from the beginning and of which there was never any shortage.

Can it be said, in the face of this unqualified and uncontradicted statement, that we are dependent upon a dye industry for explosives? There is no dye industry in Rùssia, or if there it is the only industry, except butchery, that is conducted there; and yet they seem to have all the explosives they need and a great deal more than they deserve.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield; yes.

Mr. NUGENT. I ask the Senator if it is not true that the most powerful explosives of which we have any knowledge at this time, to wit, picric acid and T. N. T., are by-products derived from the manufacture of dyes and were discovered as such?

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator is hardly correct. They are not by-products of the manufacture of dyes, as I remember, but they are by-products of the intermediates, of which dyes are also.

Mr. NUGENT. If the Senator will pardon me again, it developed at the hearings that picric acid is manufactured from precisely the same materials and by the same process up to the final step as is the dye commonly known as sulphur black.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. NUGENT. And that T. N. T. is a by-product found in the manufacture of certain other dyestuffs.

Mr. THOMAS. In a sense they are by-products, because they are a part of the intermediates which are used. We manufactured T. N. T., although our dye industry was comparatively small, but we used the same intermediate for its production. Of course, the highly organized dye industry promotes the rapid production of T. N. T.; there is no doubt about that; but our chemists can make T. N. T. without making dyes. That is my proposition, and I think the testimony bears it out.

But I continue reading from Mr. Wood:

Reference has been made to the fact that for two years we were not at war. I admit that that is true, but also there is the fact that not only were our powder and high explosive needs fully supplied but at the same time great quantities of the former were provided for the Allies. Of no other kinds of munitions was this true.

There is another significant proposition—that although we had no dye industry during the two years of the war before we entered it, we had no difficulty in supplying the Allies, under American contracts, with all the explosives that they needed.

If this record was made with practically no existing dye industry to begin with, there need be no fear for the future.

In making this statement all credit is accorded to the marvelous enterprise and energy of those engaged in this business. Knowledge of what was accomplished under unfavorable circumstances is an assurance for what can be done in the future, with the advantage of greater facilities and larger experience.

Nor can it be overlooked that the United States will, in any case, have a much greater supply of the raw materials out of which explosives and the noxious gases now used in war are made than any other country; a supply so large that we shall unquestionably export abroad great amounts of these basic materials.

Mr. Wood continues:

The intimate relation of poison-gas production to the manufacture of dyes has also been referred to. Officers of the Army, Navy, and other Government officials have been called by the dye interests. But their testimony was only as to the importance of noxious gases in warfare and the value of a dye industry in furthering the production of these gases and the development of new varieties. Nothing in the testimony of these officers affords the slightest support for the contention that a policy of embargo and licensing is necessary to protect and develop the domestic manufacture of dyes.

And the witness proceeds, either here or in another connection, to state that a very great portion of the noxious gases turned out by the American Government during the war for military purposes were made without any reference to the dye industry. He quotes from Gen. Sibert upon that proposition, who says:

Shortly after the United States entered the war, and under the leadership of Mr. Manning, Director of the Bureau of Mines, there was authorized and called together a group of chemists unequaled in the history of the world—

That is what I referred to a few moments ago, and I want to emphasize it—

Shortly after the United States entered the war, and under the leadership of Mr. Manning, Director of the Bureau of Mines, there was authorized and called together a group of chemists unequaled in the history of the world in numbers and ability to take up the search for new and powerful gases.

It (the United States) had developed a production in poison gases not only in every case greater than any other nation in the world, but in nearly all cases a production equal to or greater than all the other allies and the enemy put together.

[At this point Mr. THOMAS yielded the floor for the day.]

Tuesday, May 4, 1920.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, upon adjournment yesterday I was considering the contention urged in support of the bill regarding the creation of an efficient corps of synthetic chemists, and I endeavored to show that we not only had in this country a large corps of chemists possessed of the highest qualifications, and assembled in many cases under the employment of the large industrial concerns of the country, but that when the need for chemical work of the highest character was demanded by the exigencies of the war such a body of scientific men were assembled without difficulty and measured up to all the requirements of the country.

I do not know that it is necessary to pursue that feature of the discussion any further, although it might be developed indefinitely, since every division of manufacture in these days of high specialization more and more demands the services of analytical and synthetic chemists, which naturally stimulates the adoption of that profession by an increasing number of men and women and which does away with the necessity of depending upon any particular industry for the supply. It would be as logical to contend that the automobile industry of the United States should be further protected by an increase of the duties upon American-made automobiles, supplemented by an embargo upon the importation of those of foreign manufacture, in order to develop a greater and more efficient supply of mechanical engineers, as to contend that such legislation is needed for the production of American synthetic chemists. Of course, the industry, like all others, naturally tends toward efficiency, and therefore to the increase of efficiency through experience of those engaged in the chemical division of that industry.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NUGENT. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado if he does not believe that the efficiency of the chemists who were assembled at the time we entered the war was due in very large measure to the fact that for a period of nearly three years prior to that time large numbers of those men had been engaged in the manufacture of high explosives, in research work in the dye industry, and in other chemical establishments in the country?

Mr. THOMAS. I think there is no doubt about that. Of course, the development of the chemist is progressive, and I have not a particle of doubt that the enormous demand made by the Allies before our entrance into the war for munitions of all kinds and for equipment of every description placed American manufacturers upon their mettle and developed the chemical side of the business as it developed the other sides. But the dye industry furnished only a very small proportion, and that proportion of a technical character. That necessarily must be so, in view of the comparatively recent development of dye manufacture, which, however, was dependent in its inception not upon chemists who had received their education and development in Germany, but American chemists.

I may say to my friend, who was not a Member of this body at that time, that when the hearings were held in 1916 during the framing of the revenue bill of that year the dye men did not intimate to us—or, if they did, I do not remember it—that there was any lack of chemists in the United States for the development of that industry. On the contrary, they assured us that they had everything except duties to protect them after the war, to enable them to enter into this business, develop it, and defy all competition of a foreign character, however well organized and efficient it might be. No, Mr. President, this is an afterthought, the outgrowth of the intimate connection of the American Chemical Institute—I think that is the correct name of it—with this industry, and because unusual arguments and conditions were very properly supposed to be necessary to justify the enactment of such extraordinary legislation as is here proposed.

This personal interest has magnified very greatly the importance of the dye industry as a war industry. I do not by that statement deny for a moment that it is important, but to give to it that importance which makes it absolutely essential to the preservation of the country in the event of another military crisis is not warranted by the facts. When I say that, I base the assertion upon the admissions and statements of the proponents of this bill. One of the ablest representatives of the dye industry of the United States, who has been identified with it from its inception, a man of splendid education, himself a scientific man of no mean order, Dr. Hesse, one of the men who presented the case of the dye men before the committee in 1916, one of those advocating the bill now under discussion, and particularly advocating what was originally its licensing but what now is its embargo feature, one of the foremost technical men on dyestuffs in the world, delivered an address in Philadelphia, before the Franklin Institute, a short time prior to the hearings before the Senate Committee on Finance, and, in all probability, what he said was without reference to the question of legislation affecting dyestuffs. The Franklin Institute is a chemical society. In that address Dr. Hesse made what I think is one of the strongest arguments that can be offered against a licensing system, notwithstanding his approval of that system. I read from the hearings, beginning at page 264, an extract from that address. This extract relates to the subject of preparedness. Dr. Hesse says:

To particularize: In the explosives industry the coal-tar portion is very simple; the testing out of new products very complex and detailed; hence the invention, development, and manufacture of explosives from coal-tar materials is properly wholly an affair of the explosives industry, so highly and efficiently productive and progressive with us, and not of the still-to-be-created dye industry.

In other words, the manufacture of explosives from coal-tar products is a developed industry and goes on regardless of the existence of the coal-tar industry. Dr. Hesse continues:

The invention, development, and distribution of photographic chemicals properly belongs to the photographic industry, now and for a long time past so well developed with us, and their manufacture belongs to our well-developed organic and fine chemical industry and not to the infant dye industry.

Photographic material, in large part, is a development of the coal-tar industry, and it has its development independently of that industry, although many of the materials are included in this bill. In fact, all products of coal tar, except certain lines of perfumery, I think, are covered by the bill. It is very natural that when a particular interest developed from a certain line of materials seeks protection, all other interests developed from the same material will seek the same protection. Dr. Hesse further says:

The discovery of new synthetic remedies is properly the function of the many medical institutes and schools of research in this country; they can be manufactured by our organic and fine chemical industry, helped out by our large pharmaceutical factories, and distributed by the latter; synthetic flavors and perfumes have for years been successfully made here at a number of establishments, and they have also conducted much of the research in this field; there is no reason, compelling or otherwise, why the struggling dye makers should share their work.

Yet much of the argument before the committee in support of the pending bill was devoted to what I may term its medical side, its perfumery side, its photographic side; all of which, according to this eminent authority, are not only not dependent upon dyestuff manufacture but exist and have flourished in this country without regard to that industry.

In the manufacture of toxic and like gases for military purposes, whose invention and development belong to the Chemical Warfare Service, the largest single material involved, and at the same time the one most difficult to transport, is chlorine, which in 1914 was normally made in 23 different factories in this country, and in an amount approximating 65,000 tons annually, while during the war we made a total of but 12,000 tons of toxic-gas war materials; their manufacture, therefore, should be linked up with our going chlorine industry.

Here the doctor eliminates from the dye industry still another important branch of the military service, and expressly declares that it should be "linked up" with a distinct line of manufactures; but the witnesses again told us that unless they could secure from Congress the increased tariff plus a license or embargo system the needs of the Nation for gas in any time of future crisis could not be supplied. I read again:

The coal-tar materials needed in any or all of these arts of peace are, and have been, obtainable if we only wanted them, in any needful quantity and quality, without in any way calling upon the dye maker for them, their total requirement being under 300 tons per year. For each of these important collateral developments we have industrial points of attachment and growth of long and firmly established competitive ability; would it not be the very height of folly to ignore them and stake our entire future in these fields wholly upon the dye industry, whose future with us is by no means established?

Bear in mind, that the good doctor here is talking to chemists and not to dye manufacturers. He is emphasizing the importance of chemists to the country by calling attention to what they have accomplished in the preparation and supplying of war material, medicines, photographic material, and of flavors and perfumeries, notwithstanding the practical absence of a dye industry in America.

I read again:

I am thoroughly convinced that no one can seriously or for long take any other view than the foregoing; we can surely have all of these other industries in the highest possible state of efficiency if we only will, whether we have a dye industry or not—

Language could not be more emphatic—

That we should have our own supply of dyes is the only reason for having a domestic dye industry. The war itself proved that conclusively and beyond question.

That is the only reason, Mr. President, why we should have a dye industry, because we should produce those articles ourselves, so that in the event we can not obtain them, even temporarily, from other sources, we shall be able to supply the needs of our textile and leather manufacturers notwithstanding.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. I desire to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the National Association of Chemists, which was addressed by Dr. Hesse, adopted a series of resolutions advocating the enactment of what was then known as the Longworth bill, being House bill 8078, which the Senate committee modified and amended and reported to the Senate in the shape in which it now is? I should like to ask the Senator, further, if it is not also true that this year the National Association of Chemists, made up of about 14,000 members, at their meeting held at Los Angeles, I think, again indorsed the pending measure and requested its passage?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. There is no doubt about that. Every dye industry in the country has done the same thing. A great many chambers of commerce throughout the country have done the same thing. A great many other business associations have done the same thing. That is true of every bill of any importance that Congress considers, and especially since the war. It will continue to be true of our legislation, because propaganda is more and more relied upon for the enactment or defeat of measures of public legislation. That is no reflection upon the Chemical Institute, but the fact does not and can not in the slightest degree either impugn or impeach the statements made by Dr. Hesse before one chemical association in this country.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. Would not the adoption of those resolutions have a tendency to indicate to the mind of the Senator that the chemists addressed by Dr. Hesse were not particularly impressed with the correctness of all of the statements made by him during the course of that address?

Mr. THOMAS. It would be strange if the remarks of the doctor to a large gathering of men should be universally accepted. It would be remarkable if any organization or any assembly of men, technical or otherwise, should give assent to everything brought to their attention. I think in all probability that was the case here; but up to this time no man of them has questioned a single fact which Dr. Hesse there brought to the attention of that meeting. I go further: No man acquainted with the chemical development in the United States in the last 30 or 40 years can question it.

A little while ago I received a very strong appeal from another association, composed of experienced gentlemen, good citizens, well informed, absolutely sincere, requesting my support of a measure now pending in Congress, the enactment of which would add 50 per cent to all of the public and private indebtedness of the United States. These gentlemen represent the industry to which the bill relates, and are, therefore, anxious to see its enactment. I question if that feature of the measure has been called to their attention. I question if many of the features of this measure have been brought to the attention of the Chemical Association.

It is a great deal easier to respond affirmatively to a request, and particularly one which merely requires the enactment of a resolution or the signing of a petition, than to refuse.

While I do not pretend to any particular knowledge of chemistry, I do believe that I could take this bill, together with the hearings had upon it, and sit down with the average American chemist and at least inspire him with grave doubt of the expediency of the enactment of this measure; and I think that is particularly true of its licensing or embargo feature, whose consequences, once the precedent has been established in legislation, seem to me to be of the most sinister character. I will venture the assertion that practically the only thought behind the petition to which my attention has been called has been as to its immediate effect in favor of the particular industry, and that its character as a piece of comprehensive legislation has not received very serious consideration. They are an intelligent and a splendid body of men. There are no higher specimens of American citizenship anywhere than the men who are engaged in the pursuit of that great profession, none who are more thoroughly devoted as Americans to the welfare of this country, none who are doing more to promote its material and political progress. Like busy men everywhere, they have not the time to study problems of legislation, which we have been commissioned to do, and which we must do in our legislative capacity if we are to acquit ourselves with satisfaction either to our own consciences or to the constituencies we represent. Hence we must take into consideration not only the immediate object sought to be subserved, but the resulting consequences of what we do. We must consider not only one interest, and particularly the interest involved, but the interest of the general public, and the interests of the future; and when a man like Dr. Hesse addresses his own kind upon their own profession, and wholly without regard to any specific item of proposed legislation, we can accept what he says without qualification, for his statements and his conclusions are presumably unbiased by the intrusion of any specific interest upon his consciousness.

So when we discover from that high source that the dye industry is intimately associated with but not at all essential to the manufacture of war munitions, medicines, photographic materials, flavors, and perfumery, we must take with many qualifications the assertion that the dye industry has been singled out as a subject of special and unusual favors, and ascertain, if we can, what the true reason behind this insistent demand for legislation is.

I said yesterday that if the present protection was not sufficient it was due to no fault of Congress, but was entirely because the beneficiaries of the existing legislation either did not know what they were talking about or deceived us. I do not think they were ignorant, nor do I think that they intended for a moment to deceive the committee. I am, therefore, disposed to accept their present explanation with a good deal of skepticism, and particularly when I reflect that the committee was not supplied with information regarding the profits which have been realized by this industry between 1916 and the present time.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator is referring, of course, to the testimony adduced before the committees in 1916, when the present tariff was put on and when the interested parties asserted that that was all they needed or ever would need. Does the Senator intend at any time in the course of his discussion to dwell upon the fact that those duties never have been given any trial, because of the conditions which have surrounded the industry in the meantime?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. I may say now that some of us suggested to these gentlemen that the war furnished them the most absolute protection; that the existing hostilities, a part of which was the British embargo, through its blockade of all exports from Germany, furnished a protection which was prohibitive; hence the need for a tariff under such conditions was not perceptible. That was conceded; but they said: "The war will not last always; at least, we hope it will not. Germany may win"; and I may say that in the summer of 1916 no man dared to more than hope in his heart of hearts that Germany would be beaten. They wanted to make postwar provision, and make it in ample season, for their protection; so they said: "Give it to us now. We are giving you the best of reasons why we should have it now. It is the need hereafter. Those you concede. The law can not be effective during the war, but if it is passed now it would become instantly operative once the war shall have been over, and under these rates which we have carefully prepared and now present, we can take care of this industry, whatever the result of the war may be." That is what they said.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Is it not a fact that the only dyestuffs which have come into the country under the new tariff, as provided by the legislation of 1916, have been wholly negligible in quantity, consisting chiefly of those cargoes brought over by the Deutschland and such small quantities as have been admitted by license in the last few months?

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite sure the Deutschland cargo preceded the enactment of that law. Very few dyestuffs, if any, have been received by way of imports since the end of the war. I intend to elaborate that feature of the discussion later on.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. I may say now, however, that there have been no material shipments of dyes into this country for the very good reason that the existing supply, about which we have heard so much, is very largely a phantom; it does not exist either in Germany or outside of Germany, except in the heated imaginations of a few interested parties, who willingly accept, if, indeed, they do not inspire, rumors of vast quantities of these chemicals hidden away in Germany and in neighboring countries and only awaiting an opportunity to flood the market. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NUGENT. I ask the Senator if it is not true, as disclosed by the testimony taken in the hearings, that after several years of experimental work and the expenditure of large sums of money in that work, the finer dyes, the more delicate tints, are not yet being produced in this country?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is true, Mr. President. This industry can not spring into existence full fledged, like Minerva from the head of Jupiter. It is a matter of development, and as a consequence it can not be expected that by this time it shall have fully overtaken all phases of the dye industry and made itself competent to produce anything.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection, Mr. President, it might be well to state that at no time have manufacturers in France or England or other countries undertaken to make those delicate dyes, and I have understood that the reason for that has been because the quantities of them used in the world are not large enough to make it profitable to have manufactures of that class of dyes in all parts of the world; but in the past one country manufacturing them, even in limited quantity, has furnished all that has been wanted by the world. I suppose the same policy, more than likely, will be followed in the future, although I will say that there is an endeavor on the part of American manufacturers to manufacture those delicate colors, and it may be that America can produce enough of them. However, there is not any question but that in the past one country has manufactured these delicate colors so as to furnish the trade of the world.

Mr. MOSES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I address this question to the Senator from Utah. Are we to assume that the theory of the bill is based upon securing the maximum of protection which is required by the delicate dye which is used in small quantities, to be extended through the whole list, so that the great protection which will be required for the production of the small quantity of dye will go through all the colors produced by the American dye maker, without any attempt to equalize the protection through the list, and so that under this measure there will be applied to sulphur black, for instance, which is readily produced and which may be produced by the ton with a simple apparatus, and is being produced in many mills, where they have set up their own laboratories for it, the same degree of protection that will be applied to the fine, delicate shades, of which only a few pounds are used?

Mr. SMOOT. A provision of the bill would allow such a thing, although I do not believe it would be administered in that way. However, there is not any question but that testimony was given before the committee showing that in regard to some of these particular dyes a rate of duty of 2,000 per cent would not yield protection to the American manufacturer.

Mr. THOMAS. The House bill, as it came to the Senate, sought to do the identical thing involved in the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], because it increased the prevailing duties, both ad valorem and specific, by an average of about 50 per cent.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I have been unable, I will say to the Senator, to convince myself, from a reading of the Senate committee bill, that such would not result under it. While, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says, there is a remote chance that in the administration of the measure we might not produce that result, certainly the bill as it stands makes it possible, and I can not believe that, inasmuch as this simply involves a question of argument before commissioners, and all that sort of thing, we will not reach that result.

Mr. THOMAS. However that may be, we are continuing the duties demanded in the first instance, and they apply to from 85 to 90 per cent of American consumption, so that even under the Senate rates, which the House may or may not accept once this bill goes to conference, this 90 per cent reduction is enjoying the benefits of the highest duties ever given to the dye industry.

Let us see what was said—and I shall refer to but very few extracts—to the various committees of Congress upon this subject when from time to time it came up for consideration.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, is the Senator about to refer to what was said in 1916, or does he intend to go back into the earlier hearings in 1909, which have been flaunted in our faces as showing a particularly reprehensible course of conduct on the part of the dye consumer? If the Senator could institute a comparison between what the dye maker admitted in 1916, and what the dye maker now demands from us——

Mr. THOMAS. I intend to begin with 1882.

Mr. MOSES. I am glad to know that the survey which the Senator purposes ranges over a much longer period than that which I suggested.

Mr. THOMAS. It is because the résumé or representation which appears in this volume of Senate hearings begins at that date.

At that time Mr. James Hendrick, president of the Albany Aniline & Chemical Works, said:

In that case I think 35 per cent would be about a fair rate. I think we could live if it were fixed at that figure.

I suppose this gentleman then had reference to the particular branch of the dye industry he represented. He continued:

The specific duties I believe in because they are easily collectible, and men have no disposition to be dishonst, but with ad valorem duties the temptation to fraud is greater.

At that time Mr. V. G. Blolde, representing the American Aniline Works of Parkersburg, W. Va., said:

There is no reason whatever why, within 10 years, or even a much shorter period of time, if we are only able to avail ourselves, by means of a liberal protection, of our domestic wealth in crude material, all other coal-tar colors should not be in the same position.

The kind of protection to which he was referring was that of tariff duties, and he advocated as sufficient rates in specific form that had an ad valorem equivalent of 25 to 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. Schoellkopf, who is still, I think, in the dye industry, the head and front of the National Aniline Co., then said:

We must have an absolute protection, and this can be realized only by a specific duty. I would suggest the raising of the specific duty 25 to 50 cents per pound and dropping the ad valorem altogether. This would enable manufacturers to compete with foreign manufacturers.

* * * * * * *

I suggest this high duty in order to give the home manufacturers a start. After 5 or 10 years it would not matter if the duty were taken off; but we must have a large protection to enable us to start. * * *

I may parenthetically observe, Mr. President, that such was the reasoning of the witnesses who appeared before the committee in 1916, that "once give us the start, once enable us to establish the industry, once let us reach an 80 per cent consumption, and then you can reduce your specific duties proportionately so as to relieve the consuming public of all excess protection."

Mr. George C. Tichenor, special agent of the Treasury Department, said:

I am convinced that it would be advisable to retain the specific feature with an ad valorem rate sufficient only to serve as an equalizer, and not to exceed 15 per cent. I have thought that 25 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem would be as high a rate as could be asked for purposes of protection.

We now come to 1888, the year of the Mills bill, at which time great attention was paid to the subject of a protective tariff, so much so that the campaign of that year was made almost entirely upon a tariff issue, resulting in the election of Gen. Harrison and the defeat of Mr. Cleveland.

After a time there appeared the joint statement of the Albany Aniline Co., Schoellkopf Aniline & Chemical Co., Heller & Merz, Hudson River Aniline Color Works recommending duties in two classes, class 1, referring to alizarin colors, and class 2, referring to nonalizarin colors. Upon the first class 25 per cent ad valorem and 10 cents per pound gross weight and upon the second class 25 per cent ad valorem and 25 cents per pound gross weight were advocated, upon the theory of sufficiency.

In 1896 and 1897 Mr. Schoellkopf advocated a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem on "coal-tar products of every description, not specially exempted by name," and crudes and intermediates to be continued on the free list. And a paper submitted by him, jointly signed by his own company, Heller & Merz Co., and the Hudson River Aniline Color Works, concluded with the statement:

We feel confident that the slight increase asked for, which makes the rate what it was under the tariff act of 1883 and 1890, will enable us, with the experience we have gained under adverse circumstances, and with the great progress in scientific chemistry, to successfully compete against the imported goods and in time supply the home market.

In 1908, at a hearing of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Schoellkopf, representing his own company and the Heller & Merz Co., presented a brief requesting that the duties "on colors and dyes be increased from 30 to 40 per cent ad valorem and that all coal-tar products not colors or dyes used in the manufacture of these dyes be placed on the free list." The brief further stated:

In submitting this request we do so with the understanding that it is the intention of Congress so to adjust import duties as to give the domestic manufacturer adequate protection against his foreign rival.

Congressman Hill, of Connecticut, a most eminent Member of the House, an ardent advocate of protection and a very useful man in public life, in a speech in 1912, February 20, said that when three years previously the great chemists of the country said in the public hearings:

"If you will give us an advance of 5 per cent on the finished products of coal tar, we will develop that industry in this country, provided you leave the first derivatives or raw materials for our products on the free list."

We decided to do that and raised the duty from 30 to 35 per cent. The bill went over to the Senate, and the Senate put the duty back to 30 per cent.

In 1915 Mr. I. F. Stone, in an address delivered September 22 of that year before the National Exposition of Chemical Industries, quoted with approval the opinion of Dr. Hesse that the rates in effect from 1880 to 1883 "gave ample protection to the industry," and added his own opinion that the rates then (1915) recommended by the American Chemical Society, viz, 35 per cent ad valorem and 7½ cents specific, "would not be very far out of proportion to the 1880 rates, considering the differences in methods and costs then and now."

Mr. Stone continued:

There exists a difference of opinion as to whether any advantage would result if the patent laws required manufacture in the United States. But I think it is not disputed that such a requirement could be framed that would assure a considerable development of the production in this country of colors hereafter patented. Great Britain seems to have accomplished something in that direction prior to the war.

That résumé brings us down to the important year of 1916, when for the first time in American protective tariff legislation the dye industry was given what it demanded.

In that year the New York section of the American Chemical Society appointed a select committee to make a study of the legislation necessary for this purpose and to protect the rapidly developing dye industry and to assure its continued progress under satisfactory conditions after the war. They recognized the fact of the establishment under war conditions of the industry which needed no protection, as I have heretofore stated, but which did require antecedent legislation in order to enable the new industry to survive the shock of postwar competition.

This committee was composed of Bernard C. Hesse, J. B. F. Herreshoff, I. F. Stone, J. Merritt Matthews, H. A. Metz, D. W. Jayne, and Allen Rogers.

After a thorough study of the subject, this committee recommended on intermediates 15 per cent ad valorem and 3¾ cents per pound specific; on finished dyes, 30 per cent ad valorem and 7½ cents per pound specific.

On January 7, 1916, in a letter to Hon. E. J. Hill, of the Ways and Means Committee, the committee said it was "their expectation that as the result of such duties a complete, self-contained, and independent coal-tar chemical and dye industry will eventually result in the United States."

This statement, Mr. President, emanates from the representatives of the Chemical Society of that time, and presumably the foremost men of that society, which would necessarily include Dr. Hesse.

The letter containing that assurance was presumably prepared after careful thought and after the fullest deliberation, and doubtless, too, after conference with those more directly connected with the practical side of the industry.

I am reading from the testimony of Mr. Wood, one of the best informed men who appeared before our committee, who comments upon this letter as follows:

The only changes in the general situation that have occurred since the committee made this statement are a weakening of Germany's economic condition by the cost and wastage of three years more of war and the great strengthening of the American dye industry through added experience, and the great profits earned which have made it possible to write off much of the plant cost, and to accumulate in addition large reserve funds.

I think I have said enough or have read enough to substantiate my assertion concerning the rates of duty embodied in the act of 1916. The statement of Mr. Wood is a very significant one, and it refers to conditions which I shall afterwards discuss.

I merely pause here to make the reflection that the changes which Mr. Wood emphasizes make the rates of duty already existing much more ample than otherwise. The depletion of Germany's resources and the breaking up of her industrial system, plus the enormous profits of the American manufacturers, necessarily strengthens the position of the latter and, under the existing tariff, gives them an impregnable hold upon the dye industry not only of the United States but, perhaps, of the world.

Mr. Wood calls attention to a prospectus issued for the sale of certain stock of the National Aniline & Chemical Co. in support of his assertion regarding the prosperous condition of the industry.

In this statement it is shown that the company had plant and tangible assets of "more than $18,000,000," against which it is stated that there has been especially reserved for depreciation and obsolesence out of earnings of 18 months $8,000,000, reducing the net book value of the fixed assets to approximately $10,000,000. The New York Sun on December 2 in its financial news had a report regarding this company in which it stated that the earnings for the present year are more satisfactory than during the year 1918, which, if true, would seem to enable the company to further reduce the plant investment of $10,000,000 by another $8,000,000, so that very early after the 1st of January we may reasonably expect that a plant cost of $18,000,000 will have been reduced to $2,000,000, which certainly is far less than the cost of replacement.

That is hardly an infant industry as the term is generally understood.

Referring again to the alleged interdependence of the munitions industry upon the dye industry, I wish to call attention to the fact that the by-products of the coking industry preceded the dye industry back of 1916 by several years. I now quote from Mr. Wigglesworth, another very estimable gentleman, well posted upon this subject, and one of the principal witnesses for the bill before the committee. In a letter to the commissioner of corporations dated January 2, 1915, Mr. Wigglesworth said:

The total production of coke in the United States in 1913 was nearly twice as much as that of Germany, and it is only a question of time when all the by-products resulting from the distillation of coal and the production of coke must be recovered and their utmost value obtained or the steel industry will be unable to maintain its supremacy against the competition of countries that operate more economically in that respect.

I am now reading from Mr. Wood, who continues:

The introduction of the by-product coke oven in this country preceded the war, and has no connection whatever with the demand for by-products for the manufacture of dyestuffs on a large scale, because the dyestuff business was of little magnitude and the manufacture of intermediates almost nonexistent when these ovens were being extensively installed. The replacement of the old-fashioned beehive ovens by modern by-product ovens had been begun in earnest probably five years before the beginning of the war. The change was proceeding on an extensive scale when the war began in 1914. Several of the large steel companies had experimented with the different types.

Some of the first installations were not satisfactory, and had been replaced with others of different design. Before 1914 it had become evident that a general substitution of ovens which would save the by-products, in place of the wasteful beehive type, was inevitable. The necessities of war merely accelerated the substitution. It would have gone on, although at not quite as rapid a rate, irrespective of the war or the dye industry.

It is not true, Mr. President, that the development of the by-products of coal tar in America synchronized with the establishment of the dye industry in 1916. One would imagine from listening to the discussion of this subject, and particularly before the committee, that until these gentlemen established their industry all of the by-products of coal tar in this country were wasted, and that it was due to their enterprise and their patriotism that the attention of industrial America was directed to this great source of wealth, of which it at once began to avail itself. If that were true, it would be a very strong—perhaps an unanswerable—argument to some minds of the need for giving the benefit of the doubt to this interest in all matters of proposed legislation for its protection and development; but it is not true. The dye industry has no more right to claim credit for the development of the coal-tar by-product industry in the United States than it has to claim credit for the adoption of the Constitution.

Its importance had long before that time attracted attention; as stated by Mr. Wigglesworth, the need on the part of the great steel manufacturing concerns to save the further waste of this immensely valuable by-product if they were to retain their supremacy in the steel manufacturing world was driving them to it, and, of course, would have continued had the dye industry of America never been heard of. I continue the statement of Mr. Wood on page 237:

The by-products of the distillation of coal for coke that go to the dyestuff industry are only a fraction of the total production. I am not able to tell you what that fraction is, but I asked the gentleman who testified before you, Mr. Rust, some time ago what it was. He was not prepared to say exactly. I asked him if it was 10 per cent; he thought it would be over 10. There was some discussion as to whether it would reach 20 per cent; he did not think it would. But the total consumption of the coke by-products used in the manufacture of these intermediates and dyestuffs does not probably represent as much as 20 per cent, probably a great deal less than 20 per cent, of the total output, and the total output is steadily increasing.

He then goes on to say that the United States is in an invulnerable position so far as crude coal-tar products are concerned, and that the opinion is well founded that Germany must now look to the United States for no inconsiderable proportion of her material needed for the dye industry.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Judging from what the Senator from Colorado has just read, the coal tar from which the dyes are taken is itself a by-product, is it not, from the coking process?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. There are several processes. There are what are called the "crudes," which are the first products of the distillation; then come what are called the "intermediates," from which all these other products are manufactured or derived through chemical combinations, such as dyes, medicines, flavors, photographic materials, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The question I desired to ask the Senator from Colorado was whether or not the by-products from which the dyes are derived are not themselves by-products of the coking process?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; unquestionably they are by-products of the coking process and the gas-making process.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I can not be in the Chamber all the afternoon, but I have been studying this bill, and if it does not interrupt the Senator, I should like to know the facts. As I understand the bill, it proposes that in lieu of a high prohibitive tariff there shall be placed an embargo on all dyes that can be made in this country, leaving the tariff of 1916 to be placed upon those that must be imported into the country.

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator is mistaken. This bill is a joint tariff and embargo bill. As the House passed the bill, the duties were increased about 50 per cent of their present amount. Then an embargo is to be placed upon all dyes which are mnufaceured here or which can be substantially supplied by something just as good, confining the importation entirely to that small class of dyes which remain over after those two conditions shall have been complied with.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But those dyes that must be imported, that per cent of the total which can not be produced in this country or approximated by something just as good, will bear the rates of duty that are imposed under the tariff law of 1916?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; although the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] has proposed amendments which are designed as a substitute for the embargo system which increase very materially the rates of duty upon that class of dyes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a further question. I may have been unfortunate in the manner of putting my first question, although the Senator's answer was responsive, that for the protection of all dyes that can be produced in this country, or dyes approximating the imported article, there shall be an embargo against the importation of foreign dyes in competition, and only that per cent of dyes which can not be produced in this country may be imported. Has the Senator any official or authentic figures showing what per cent of dyes of the kind we need can be produced in this country?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] places the amount being produced in this country at 90 per cent of the domestic consumption. Some question was raised as to whether that figure was correct. I thought 80 per cent was within the mark, and yesterday, for my own part, I assumed, in view of the differences, 85 per cent to represent the dyes which are actually produced, and for some time have been produced, and which are consumed in American manufacture.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Has the Senator any official or authentic figures showing in what quantity they are produced? Are they being produced in sufficient quantities to meet the requirements of the American trade, or even in excess of those requirements?

Mr. THOMAS. They are being produced in excess of those requirements, because the export last year of American dyes aggregated in value about $17,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, one further question—and I ask the questions because I should like to get the facts, and I hope the Senator will place in the RECORD the sources of his information and the authority for the statements so that those of us who desire to vote on this bill intelligently may be able to do so. I wish to know if the Senator has any official or authentic information, or figures, as to the profits that are being made and as to comparative prices between this country and foreign countries.

Mr. THOMAS. The only information which I can give the Senator upon that subject I will state hereafter. It refers to one company, which controls a considerable number of subsidiary concerns. I can state to the Senator now that this company, upon the information available, made something over 100 per cent upon its capitalization within 18 months of time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was during the period of the war?

Mr. THOMAS. That was during the period of the war, presumably; it was after the German war began.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Was the manufacture of dyestuffs by American concerns, to any appreciable commercial extent, entered into previous to the World War?

Mr. THOMAS. No; there were seven or eight institutions which manufactured certain lines of dyes; that is all. All efforts to secure the tariff demanded by the dye interests were unavailing, owing to the opposition of the manufacturers of textiles. The rate in the Payne-Aldrich bill, for example, and that in the Simmons-Underwood bill was practically identical.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. So that they did not begin to engage in the manufacture of dyes to the extent which the industry has now gone until they were protected, either by the war itself or by legislation?

Mr. THOMAS. The first protection deemed sufficient for the development of the industry was the war itself. Immediately after the British embargo upon German exportations the need for dyes became apparent here, and that need stimulated the manufacture of dyes in America. The industry, comparatively speaking, had developed extensively up to 1916, when a tariff, written by the dye men as to rates of duty and accepted by the House and Senate committees, was enacted into law. It is under that tariff that the industry is now operating.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Just one question further and then I am through. In connection with the tariff to which the Senator has just referred and which was alleged to have been written by the dye people themselves, was not the statement made then by them, or something tantamount to such a statement, that in the case that tariff was enacted that was all they would require for the perpetuation and protection of their industry?

Mr. THOMAS. That was iterated and reiterated.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from South Carolina asked the Senator from Colorado as to the profits, as I understood him, of the National Aniline Chemical Co. What did the Senator state about their profits?

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps, as so many inquiries are made upon that subject, I might as well digress for a moment and present it to the Senate. I am sorry that so few Senators are present.

[At this point Mr. THOMAS yielded to Mr. KENYON, who suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called.]

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] inquired what information I could give him regarding the profits derived from the prosecution of the dye business in America under the present tariff. The information before the committee upon that subject consists of a single item furnished by a statement of the Sunbury Converting Works, of Sunbury, Pa., which calls attention to a copy of Bradstreet's report upon the financial condition of the National Aniline Chemical Co., based upon a report furnished by that company to that concern:

It will be noted this company was incorporated May 29, 1917, at which time, so far as can be learned, there was no reserve for depreciation, obsolescence, etc. From date of organization up to December 31, 1918 (18 months), they have been able to put into this obsolescence, etc., account $9,500,352.64. In addition, they have accumulated surplus or profits since organization of $4,134,544.79, and in reserve and other contingencies and Federal taxes they have set aside $9,188,733.68. These are evidently the earnings which this company has earned in 18 months, to say nothing of the dividends set aside in the statement payable January 2 and 15, 1919, and possibly some dividends paid prior to these dates. Eliminating the dividends, these three items alone show an undivided earning of $22,823,661.11 in 18 months upon a capital of $25,504,650. If this capital represents real value—

And I may say parenthetically that it probably does not—the earnings are about 100 per cent in 18 months, in addition to dividends paid. If the old corporations were taken over at inflated values, it represents a much larger earning. Ordinarily 10 per cent for depreciation and 10 per cent for earnings is considered fair (it is beyond the amount permitted by our tax laws). This would mean $1,950,000 for depreciation and $2,550,000 for earnings annually, or $6,750,000 in 18 months, as against $22,823,661.11 now earned.

We submit that a tariff would be sufficient to protect this infant industry earning 100 per cent from utter ruin, and even if it would be compelled to reduce its earnings about $10,000,000 every 18 months its earnings would still be in keeping with most American industries.

It is perhaps unfair to conclude that this statement of earnings represents the average of earnings by other companies, but when we consider that this is the substance of our information upon the subject, I think it is perfectly fair to conclude that the dye industry taken as a whole is enormously profitable under existing tariff conditions. Certainly a concern like the National, earning 100 per cent in 18 months upon a stated capital of $25,000,000, of which doubtless a very cosiderable proportion represents fictitious values, would ordinarily have a hard time convincing the average man that it needed protection and embargoes in order to save it from utter and complete collapse.

I wish I had further specific information regarding both the actual amount of capital invested and the actual sums of money realized in operation. They are available. The legislators are entitled to that information. If they have received it, I am unaware of the fact.

We are told by Mr. du Pont, whose testimony I will consider later on, that his concern has not made any appreciable profit up to the present time. If so, it is one of the Du Pont branches of enterprise that differs very materially from the results of the operation of many others.

Having made this digression, let me return to a consideration of the sufficiency of the present tariff. One of the by-products of coal tar is the great remedy for syphilis, known as "606," or salvarsan. This is included in the bill because it is one of the by-products of the coal-tar industry, and therefore essential to be protected, lest with the resumption of normal conditions the German product again commands the market and the German manufacturer again possesses a monopoly of a remedy which is in enormous demand the world over. Dr. Stieglitz, one of the most eminent professional men in the United States, and one of the most intelligent, as well as one of the proponents of this measure, in discussing this subject, says:

These research chemists studied the problem and worked out their own methods, and as a result in 1917—

That is, our chemists, mind you, the need for which can only be supplied by monopolizing the American dye industry—

these research chemists studied the problem and worked out their own methods, and as a result in 1917 we were manufacturing American arsphenamine—

Which is another name for salvarsan—under licenses from the Federal Trade Commission.

* * * * * * *

The German product sold before the war—that is, before 1914—at $3.50 a dose. The first price fixed by the Federal Trade Commission was from $1 to $1.50 a dose, which showed already the tremendous advantage of American manufacture.

In the course of these two years the following developments have occurred: In the first place, the purity of the drug has risen to such an extent that the official standard, instead of being only 60 is 100 milligrams, which is over a 50 per cent improvement. But, as a matter of fact, the American brands run now from 120 to 130. There is practically none on the market now that will not run from 120 to 130. That is twice as good as it was originally. That is the result of research work of about a year and a half.

By our chemists who are too ignorant and too deficient in capacity to measure up to the German standard—

In the second place, the drug is now being sold wholesale to hospitals at 60 cents, and I was told this noon some even at 30 cents a dose. That, of course, means that the drug is from 5 to 10 times as cheap as it was before 1914, and the blessing to the country can not be overestimated.

The doctor was asked where the crude material came from, and he said:

The original crude material should come from the dye manufacturers.

Senator WATSON. You now get your crude material for the manufacture of salvarsan from the dye plants?

Dr. STIEGLITZ. From the dye or coal-tar plants. In the second place, one of the most successful large productions has been carried out by a manufacturer who has had dye-making experience. He has put it on a large scale, producing from 8,000 to 15,000 doses in a day, in a room smaller than this one here.

Then the doctor took up a second drug, procaine, or synthetic cocaine, also a by-product, and one of the most useful drugs known to the profession.

Mr. Herman A. Metz, one of the manufacturers of salvarsan, tells the committee, in addition to what Dr. Stieglitz has stated, that he is manufacturing this drug and can sell it at this remarkably low price and defy the competition of the world; and I have no doubt that the same is true of these other drugs; yet we are told in cold blood that, since this valuable addition to the medicines of the world is a derivative of the same coal-tar by-products which are used in the manufacture of dyes, the dye industry must receive additional protection, plus an embargo, if we are to preserve the manufacture of this useful commodity in America, which is now produced at such a greatly reduced price, and as a result of experiments of chemists who are supposedly inferior to those turned out by the dyestuff manufacturers of Germany.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that a mere statement of these conditions should be sufficient to convince the average mind of the unwisdom, to say nothing of the injustice, of increasing these duties, either by way of specific increases, or by way of that indirect process which the Senator having charge of the bill calls "selected importation," but which seems to me to be the direct equivalent of an embargo.

However, there are other reasons, equally convincing to me, against the enactment of this measure and in support of the contention of the sufficiency of existing duties. Already these manufacturers are discriminating against the home consumer and exporting dyes and selling them to foreigners for less than the home manufacturer is required to pay. I again refer to the testimony of Mr. Wood, which I have nowhere seen contradicted, and I have read the testimony offered in support of and against this bill as carefully, I think, as has anyone. On page 597 of the hearings, during the examination of Mr. George B. Sanford, Mr. Wood said:

I understand that 20 per cent of the dyes in this country, both from domestic manufactures and from statistics, before the war, consisted of indigo. Is that right, Mr. Metz?

Mr. METZ. What was that?

Mr. WOOD. Twenty-five per cent of the total consumption is indigo?

Mr. METZ. At least that, before the war.

Mr. WOOD. That is a question about which more of this controversy is revolving than anything else, because it is a color which some of those chiefly anxious for a licensing system are very greatly interested in making.

I think that vegetable indigo has never heretofore been included in a tariff bill; but this one covers it. The synthetic indigo drove it out of the market long ago, and it only returned through the exigencies of the war; but this commodity, too, must now be banned by a prohibitory arrangement, notwithstanding its usefulness and the impossibility of its competition against the cheaper synthetic products.

Mr. Wood continues:

Since the last hearing I have been endeavoring to find out the present price in Europe of indigo, and the information which I obtained on Saturday was that the price at which it is being sold for import into Great Britain, France, and Belgium is 50 cents; that is, equivalent to 50 cents United States gold, not marks—50 cents a pound.

Mr. CHOATE. That is the price they can get for it, not the price they can sell it for.

Mr. WOOD. I presume that Germany is as anxious to sell her products to-day and realize upon them as any seller ever has been. I think we may, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, assume that that is the commercial price—it is the price that they are able to get for their dye, and they are not likely to sell it for less.

Senator WATSON. What is the price here?

Mr. WOOD. A representative of the Dow Chemical Co., I think, stated that they were selling theirs for 65 cents a pound.

Mr. METZ. For export, but not for domestic use; at 75 cents a pound for domestic use.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Who is Mr. Wood, from whose testimony the Senator has been reading?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. John P. Wood.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. John P. Wood, president of the Pequea Mills, of Philadelphia.

Mr. THOMAS. He was frankly opposed to this bill, but he was a very intelligent man—at least, I so considered him—and testified at great length. Much of the testimony which I have so far read during the consideration of this bill has been that of Mr. Wood.

There is another instance which I made a note of appearing in the hearings, but which I can not readily turn to, showing a similar discrimination.

One of the indictments against the German—and the charge was true—related to his capacity to undersell in the foreign market until competition was extinguished and then increasing the price so that the losses incurred in the process of killing competition were recouped. It would seem, on a small scale perhaps, but it would seem, nevertheless, that the American manufacturers of dyes, like other American manufacturers in the past, are indulging in the same practice; and it is incredible that they could do so if they needed additional protection from the Government in order to enable them to exist. The conclusion, to my mind, is that this is another and a most significant indication of the sufficiency of the present tariff; but there are other equally strong indications to the same effect.

I will turn to the testimony of Mr. Wigglesworth just for a moment with reference to American production, and say for the information of the Senator from Ohio that Mr. Henry Wigglesworth is on the board of the General Chemical Co.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator can not complete his remarks to-night, there are several Senators who desire an executive session, and if he will yield at this point I will move an executive session.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in a moment, if the Senator will permit me to continue the subject briefly. On page 87 Mr. Wigglesworth says:

I think if we knew the exact facts of the amount of interference that the textile man would suffer from a single system of control on dyes—

He is now speaking of a license system—that it would be so utterly insignificant and that we would be really astounded to hear any opposition from the textile man. America is producing to-day more than all of the dyes the country needs.

And this, mind you, was last winter.

Senator WATSON. Not of all kinds, Mr. Wigglesworth?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Not in variety, but all the dyes the country needs—I mean the quality and quantity for our domestic needs. It is only to attain the European standard——

Senator WATSON (interposing). You mean by that that we do not need to make any more dyes of any kind in the United States in order to supply the home demand?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. We would not need one if Germany did not exist, not one.

And I shall show before I am through with my discussion of this bill that for dye purposes Germany does not exist.

Senator WATSON. We do not need any more dyes?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. No more dyes if Germany did not exist. The only reason you need them is that Germany, having established a wider variety, and the dye consumers of this country having experienced that wider variety, they miss it.

Senator CURTIS. Are there not some of the varieties produced in Germany that can not be produced in this country?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. No; none that can not be produced in time, providing capital can be induced to invest in their production.

Senator CURTIS. How long a time would it take, in your judgment, to accomplish that?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. That is, to my mind, not a question of chemistry; it is a question of capital.

Senator CURTIS. Then it is your idea that if you could persuade capital to come into the business at once that it could be done in a very short time?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. No; I am entirely in accord with the previous witnesses on that subject. I do not think you can perfect any process in anything or in any industry in less than three to five years, or somewhere about that length of time. After you go into an industry where you are an amateur it takes time to perfect it. It is especially so in regard to dyes. But if Germany could be submerged you would not hear a word about needing any more dyes.

That is an astonishing statement from a promoter of the bill.

Of course, the Germans are ably represented over here, and it is another matter that has given me a good deal of concern. The importers should have fair play—that is to say, the dye distributor in the United States naturally employed this only source of supply for dyes.

Then, on page 88, he proceeds:

There is still in the minds of the textile consumer—I do not mean any longer the man who uses indigo in blue jeans and denims, etc.; I do not mean the man who wants blacks for hosiery, etc.; I do not mean the vast majority of dye consumers who are abundantly satisfied. I mean that fine trade that, having experienced the delight of an absolutely sun-fast color on wool, cotton, or silk has to go back to a fugitive color in a fabric that costs a hundred times as much as the dyes cost.

Senator WATSON. And can not that be done in the United States?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. It can be done in the United States.

Senator WATSON. But is not being done?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. They have not got to that point, that is all.

Senator WATSON. That is to say, in the browns and the blacks and what we call the "solid colors," we are manufacturing enough now?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. In all the shades, Mr. Senator. In every shade under the sun out of those 300 dyes, America is now making—you can get any shade you want, practically; but you will not get it in the more recent vat dyes—the vat dye is a simpler dyeing operation, as I understand it, and furnishes the latest color that the scientific world has developed.

Testimony supporting the sufficiency of the present rate of duties could not be made stronger. Statements like these, coming from veteran experts in the business, pivoting their demand upon the sole proposition that Germany is not submerged, and if she were they would not require this additional legislation, only leaves it necessary to show that Germany as a producer of this commodity is to-day helpless and broken, unable to produce sufficient for more than her own purposes, and this meets the very last proposition that can be with any degree of consistency thrust forward as the basis for such legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that this witness was addressing himself at the time to the embargo provisions of the present bill?

Mr. THOMAS. To the entire bill, including the embargo provision.

Mr. POMERENE. And also including the increased duties?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. This was prior to the time when the Senate rejected the increased duties.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. It was the license feature, I think.

Mr. THOMAS. It was the license feature that he was discussing at this particular time; but his testimony had reference to the bill in general, as I remember.

[At this point Mr. THOMAS yielded the floor for the day.]

Wednesday, May 5, 1920.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the discussion of the pending bill I have thus far attempted to demonstrate the nonexistence of the causes that have been assigned and relied upon to support it. I have to the best of my ability sought to disprove the contention of the proponents of the bill that its enactment was essential to the preservation of the industry or to the creation of the class of scientific experts whose researches and capacity are so essential to our modern industrial life. There remains to be considered the extent of German competition, both actual and potential, that being one of the grounds upon which the enactment of the measure is so urgently demanded.

I concede that if, upon the establishment of peace, there be great reserves of dyestuffs accumulated during or before the war and at present either in or subject to the control of Germany, which may be imported to the United States and cast upon the market at prices so far below the cost of American manufacture as virtually to paralyze, if not entirely suspend, further activities of the American competitors, that some means as drastic as the situation requires should be resorted to for the purpose of preventing such a calamity. No man, whatever his opinions regarding the virtues of a protective tariff may be, would for a moment subject this great industry to such a menace in view of our experiences as a result of the war and for a part of the time during which the war was being prosecuted. Hence it is necessary to examine into and ascertain, if we can, to what extent, if at all, this apprehension is justified.

I have no doubt in my own mind that many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee, and, doubtless, a great many people in general who receive their information from reports and statements in the public press, entertain the sincere conviction that America is face to face with this sort of competition, once commercial relations are reestablished between the United States and Germany; but the men interested in the business and who are demanding this tariff, the men who have made a study of the situation, can only insist upon the existence of those conditions at the expense of their intelligence.

No limitations have been placed upon the quantity of dye materials said to be in existence and ready for an assault upon the American industry with the first opportunity that may be vouchsafed to their owners. Mr. Choate, the attorney for the dyestuffs manufacturers, the proponents of this measure, and who was also a witness before the committee, testifying at considerable length and apparently well versed in many of its phases, voiced this apprehension in the language which I shall presently read. During a discussion of the wisdom or unwisdom of licensing the would-be importers of dyestuffs—he was contending against the proposition to increase the rates of duty far beyond those contained in the present law as being entirely competent to accomplish the purpose in hand—he said:

> I think it is very difficult to pass on any such proposition without a concrete draft, but I do think that it puts the burden on the wrong party. It puts the burden on the dye industry to show that something should not come in, and, as Senator CURTIS suggested, unless it were coupled with a definite provision preventing anything coming in until the tariff commission had had a chance to pass on it, the result would be that there would be considerable free importation before the protective measure took effect, and that would ruin the industry when three shiploads came in.

Something, perhaps, may be excused in this gentleman because of the zeal which a competent counsel should exhibit in behalf of his client; but if it be true that an industry in which millions have been invested and whose output is far beyond the quantity and value of prewar imports of dyestuffs will collapse from the importation of only three shiploads of competitive material, then the industry is not worth preserving; no amount of protection, short of a prohibition as absolute as that imposed by the war itself, could avail to keep it alive; and I think every man within the sound of my voice will agree that no industry deserves to exist in any country which needs for its existence the imposition of prohibitory duties. I suppose we could raise bananas in hothouses in Boston provided we should absolutely prohibit the importation of bananas from any other country, but the expense consequent upon thus establishing the industry and the absurdity of indulging in it are apparent from the suggestion that I have made.

It is nonsense for any intelligent man to come before a committee and make such a statement. Of course, it carries the implication that the slightest imaginable competition would cause the collapse of the business, that the slightest invasion of the American market would upset this industry, paralyze its activities, and involve it in irretrievable ruin. Such, Mr. President, is not the case. Mr. Choate's statement, however, is not more absurd than the statements of his associates, assuming to inform the committee of the existence of 250,000 tons of dyestuffs available to the importers of the material, ready to invade the American markets as opportunity should offer.

Now, let me refer for a moment to some of these assertions. I first call attention to the statement of Mr. Howard on pages 65 and 66 of the hearings. This gentleman represents the Manufacturing Chemists' Association of the United States, an organization founded in 1872. He said that a license system was needed in order to protect the industry. Then he was asked why that was so, and he testified:

> At the present time if you were to try to create a tariff, according to the rule that we tried to apply in 1909 or 1910—that is, a tariff to cover the difference in cost of production at home and abroad—I do not know how it would be possible to find out what that difference would be. Who could tell what the cost of production in Germany to-day is as compared to the production in this country? And more especially in view of the perfectly extraordinary rate of exchange, and in view of the further fact that, as I understand, prices are different in different parts of Germany.

Mr. President, if the declarations of the Republican Party, which is the great advocate of protection, furnish any guide as to the standard which theoretically is to be applied to the enactment of tariff legislation—and I have no reason to discard or to repudiate those declarations—the very fact that it is impossible at present to ascertain even remotely the difference between the cost of production of dyestuffs at home and abroad constitutes the most cogent and unanswerable reason for insisting upon a postponement of all legislation like this until that fact can be established.

Protection can be defended only upon two grounds, the one being the need for revenue—and that is the Democratic ground—and the other the need for stimulating and encouraging the development of home industry regardless of revenue, which is the Republican theory. In the one instance the needs of the Government constitute the measure of the duties; in the other the needs of the protected industries constitute that measure.

In the one the estimates needed for the public expenditure furnish us with a standard; in the other the conditions against which protection must be enacted determine the rate, unless we have reached the point where it is proposed to disregard all standards and allow those insisting upon a partnership with their Government to state the amount of the duty which they desire and give it to them.

I noticed, Mr. President, during the hearings upon this and kindred bills that in almost every instance those applying for this legislative relief were asked, "How much duty do you want?" In the House the amount stated seemed to have been freely conceded, thereby discarding absolutely the Republican doctrine of a protection basis, to wit, the cost of producing the goods in question in foreign countries as compared to the cost of production in our own. When a witness informs the committee that under prevailing conditions that fact is impossible of ascertainment he ought to state himself entirely out of court; for all protection is taxation, whether it be for revenue purposes or whether it be for protective purposes, and the tax goes either to the Government or to the beneficiary. If it goes to the beneficiary, justice to the public, who bear the burden, to the consumers, who must purchase at home-fixed prices, requires that the duty shall be as small as possible, and sufficient for the purposes of encouraging and promoting the industry, not for the purpose of giving it a monopoly, and thus swelling their profits beyond all reason.

This argument, of course, was aimed not so much at the protective feature of the bill as it was to sustain the idea that something more than protection was needed, and that the rates of duty fixed should be supplemented by the license system, so called, which was engrafted upon the bill by the House committee.

The witness goes on:

So, gentlemen of the committee, it would be hopeless to attempt to discover what would be the difference in cost of production here and in Germany. Then, again, even supposing you were able to make a tariff covering the difference between cost of production in Germany and here, you would be still confronted by the willingness of that enormous industry to pay no attention to cost of production there and proceed to stamp out the industry here at all costs that might be necessary to do it as quickly as possible before the industry here gains any more strength.

Senator CURTIS. Well, if that is the only difficulty, why could not that be prevented by an antidumping law?

Mr. HOWARD. An antidumping law, or an unfair-competition law, so far as any I have ever seen, would not act until after the dumping or the damage had been done. No antidumping law that I have ever seen would anticipate such action by Germany. It could only be brought to bear after the damage had been done. In other words, we have a situation to-day in which things are moving with almost lightninglike rapidity in these different countries. The English, as has already been pointed out, fully realize that, and they have established a license system. The French realize the situation and have done the same thing. The Italians also have foreseen what would happen and have done the same thing.

Perhaps it will not be out of place here to reiterate that these licensing precautionary measures to which our late allies resorted as a protection against German importations have been repealed. These countries want the dyes against which the licensing system was aimed and can not get them. They have discovered, to their sorrow, that they hastily enacted repressive measures because the same scarecrow was dangled before their eyes which the American manufacturer erected before ours, and the purpose of which is to continue war prohibitory conditions notwithstanding that hostilities have ceased. Now, that is human, perhaps. The man who has enjoyed a monopoly very naturally is human enough to want to continue it. The man who has ever had an annual pass over a railroad never pays his fare afterwards without a sense of personal injury. He feels imposed upon because his privilege is gone. It is a human feeling. I have entertained it myself, and hence I can speak from personal experience; and I think the illustration is a most apt one.

Senator CURTIS. You know, Mr. Howard, a licensing system is very strongly opposed in this country. I am not speaking for the other members of the committee, but according to my judgment there is not much opposition to the levying of a tariff in order to build up this business, while there is opposition to a licensing system. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I would like to hear you people very fully on the antidumping or the tariff features of this matter.

Mr. Howard, however, continued to insist that an antidumping law would prove of little benefit to the interests which he represented.

Mr. Wigglesworth also contributed to this feature of the hearing. I read from page 85. Mr. Wigglesworth says:

Without some system of control there will be a repetition of what occurred in the case of the Benzol Products Co., now a constituent of the National Aniline Co. They started out in 1910 making aniline oil, which is the product most largely used as an intermediate in the manufacture of dyes, explosives, etc.

The manufacture of that article had been tried out way back, I think, in the seventies. At least three corporations had gone into its production and each time had been promptly hit on the head by the Germans.

In 1910 the Schoelkopfs and others represented that they were absolutely under the domination of the Germans. They were making dyes in a comparatively small way, but they were dependent upon Germany for intermediates.

They had repeatedly called our attention to the fact that any time anyone showed his head in coal-tar dyes he was hit. So finally the General Chemical Co., the Solvay Process Co., and the Barrett Co.—three of the very largest corporations in the United States—agreed that they would take a chance on aniline jointly. We did not expect to make any money. We expected to put it out as feeler in the interests of the small dye industry over here. That was in 1910.

The Germans sent an emissary over here as soon as they knew we were producing, to say that we must quit, and what would our expenses amount to, for they would reward us to keep out. We said that we would feel our way, anyway, and did not care to discuss the matter.

Subsequently Congress put a duty of 10 per cent on the article, and that showed to the Germans that we really were powerful enough to get the support of the State. Then they saw that they could not hit this little enterprise any too quick, so they immediately absorbed the duty and the price dropped 2 cents a pound as well.

This is what Mr. Wigglesworth calls a selective attack—an attack which, I think, was taught to Germany by America; a condition which, prior to the passage of the Sherman antitrust law, was a very common feature of big business in America; a practice which had its inception, I think, with the Standard Oil Co., and which, no doubt, our foreign competitors were swift to learn. It is wrong. It is not only wrong when practiced against America by foreigners, but it is wrong and indefensible when practiced by Americans upon Americans. There is no question about the prevalence of such conditions in the dye industry prior to the war; but when you tell me that such practices are not overcome by the tariff duty of 1916, I must answer: "Gentlemen, that is the tariff which you said in 1916 would not only give you the markets of America, but would give you absolute protection against any and all forms of German competition after the war should have ended. You did not tell us then about these methods of competition as the basis for an extra request for an embargo. You told us about them with a view of securing the rates of duty which we permitted you to write in the bill."

Mr. Wigglesworth, however, goes on, and on page 88 of the record he takes occasion to say:

If Germany could be submerged, you would not hear a word about needing any more dyes.

And it is the fact that Germany is not submerged that makes an embargo, as a supplement to the rates of duty, essential to their protection.

I do not know whether Mr. Wigglesworth is familiar with the terms of the German treaty or not. If he will do me the honor, however, to read my discussion of this bill, I will endeavor to give him some information regarding the operation of some clauses of the treaty upon this and other German industries before I am through.

I refer now to the testimony of Mr. Waters, page 143. This gentleman is the proprietor of the Germantown Dye Works, in Philadelphia. Speaking of German competition, he says:

Previous to the war, as you gentlemen know, we were depending entirely upon Germany for our source of supply of dyestuffs. When the war broke out there was a great hullabaloo as to what was going to be the final result of the textile industry in the United States, owing to the shortage of dyestuffs. I fussed about with some other gentlemen who are present to-day seeing what could be done in the way of getting dyestuffs from the other side. I bought all the dyestuffs I could get my hands on, and that was quite a lot, and then we set about to see if there were any way possible whereby there were any goods in Holland or any other place that we could have shipped into the United States. I remember going into one of the large importer's offices, representing a large manufacturing concern on the other side, about some dyestuffs, and I must confess that we got into a little fuss over the affair. He practically laughed at us Yankees, as they called us, and he seemed to be very cheerful over the supposed inability of the American people to ever make dyestuffs. He painted a very beautiful picture of millions of unemployed men and women walking about the streets of the United States, due to the textile industries being closed up for the want of dyestuffs. I said to him, "If the war lasts five years, you will have a different story to tell. We will be making dyestuffs in the United States in five years, so that if the men in Germany along the Rhine are blown up by our bombshells you will never know that dyestuffs were ever made other than in the United States."

Gentlemen, that is my opinion to-day. If the dyestuff industry in Germany were demolished, we would not be here to-day asking you to protect the industry that has been developed in the United States up to the present time. The majority of the American people would never know that dyestuffs ever came from any other place but the United States. To-day I am not using 1 ounce of German dyestuffs that I know of in my plant, and I am turning out 30,000 pounds of stuff a day.

This gentleman, enjoying such a marked degree of prosperity, tells us that if the dyestuff business in Germany were demolished, he would be happy; that he has not any use for it. The predictions which he made regarding American manufactures were verified in less than five years, but the specter of German competition is still before them, magnified into many dimensions and held aloft before the frightened eyes of the House and Senate as something not only ominous but actual, not only existent but menacing, not only serious but potentially destructive.

On page 145 of the hearings, Senator NUGENT asked Mr. Waters:

Do you think if the licensing plan was followed for two years it would be sufficient to protect this industry?

Mr. Waters said:

I rather think it would not be long enough, but it would be a very great advantage, sir. I am not a manufacturer of dyestuffs, but I do feel that in five years' time, with the licensing feature attached to this proposition, that we will be then in a position where it will make very little difference as to what happens on the other side, so far as dyestuffs are concerned.

How very like the assurances of 1916 that sounds. He continued:

I do not feel that Germany can furnish dyestuffs anything like as cheap as she did.

There is another very significant concession. He proceeded:

They have to pay higher wages. They also have trouble in getting coal, and that, in connection with the licensing system, I think will prolong it for years than it otherwise would be. They are not going to get back as rapidly as some of us think they will. While it is pointed out that their personnel is intact over there, their plants ready and operating, that I do not know. But if you can see your way clear to sanction a licensing of this dyestuffs proposition it will add a great deal to us in the United States in the way of getting into an independent position here to compete with Germany in the future.

It would certainly add a great deal to the profits made out of the monopoly of the American market through prices fixed at the dictation of the dye trust that is to be when this bill becomes a law.

I now come to the testimony of Prof. Herty. Prof. Herty is the editor of the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, published by the American Chemical Society. For a long time he was connected with one of the universities in the South, I think in the State of North Carolina. During that period of time his views regarding the protective tariff were very similar to my own. The professor subsequently saw a great light, and he became and is an ardent champion of what our Republican friends delight to designate "the American system."

The good professor, too, is an excellent illustration of the old truth that there is no zeal like the zeal of a convert. This worthy gentleman is making up for lost time by becoming as extreme as it is possible for a man to be and still keep within bounds. In his discussion of the bill to place a duty upon surgical instruments, and to deprive the educational institutions of the country of the privilege they have always enjoyed of securing those instruments free of duty, the professor thinks that the substitution of American-made instruments for the foreign instruments which are now permitted to be used duty free will cultivate a high and lofty spirit of patriotism in the students. Whenever they perceive that the instruments with which they are experimenting are made in America, and reflect upon the fact that they have to pay therefor the cost of manufacturing, plus a good profit, plus a high tariff duty, they will lay down their instruments and join in chorus of "My country, 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty." I was surprised that he did not assure us that if we could be certain that our teeth when they ached would be pulled with American forceps we would welcome toothache as one of the joys of life.

That is carrying the principle of protection, coupled with the principle of patriotism, to the nth degree. If it be true in these degenerate times, when patriotism is sadly lacking in some sections, that the spirit can be revived and that great faculty restored through the substitution of American-protected experimental instruments in the colleges for those which they have used heretofore, by all means let us do it. I am willing to make any sacrifices, Mr. President, even to the sacrifice of principle, if I have any left—which some of my critics seem to question in these late days—if by so doing I can aid in restoring or reviving the spirit of patriotism. But as to the good doctor's suggestion, I confess I am from Missouri. I do not believe that the results which he so cheerfully predicts from the substitution of protected American-made instruments for other instruments received free of duty would have any such consequence.

I read from Dr. Herty on page 190 of the hearings, and I think those who honor me with their attention will agree with the statement I just made, that Dr. Herty is carrying the principle of protection to extremes, evidently in atonement for his past sins of free trade commission.

The doctor went over to Paris shortly after the war, representing the War Trade Board, or one of its divisions, with a view of inquiring into the dye situation, and incidentally of securng some dyes badly needed in this country. He had quite an experience over there, and, among other things, he said that he desired to give the committee the benefit of certain conversations he had during the trip which left an indelible impress upon his mind. He said that while he was abroad he talked with a number of Army and Navy officers, American, French, and British, regarding the future, and they expressed the hope that we were now entering upon an era of peace, but none of them expressed the conviction that we were not going to have more war.

Of course, more war is an essential to the demand for more duty, not more actual war, but more probable war, more possible war, and one might accept the assurances of possible wars or probable wars with some degree of doubt were he not fortified by the assurance, not of outsiders but of men in the business, of the certainty of future wars. The professor said:

> On the boat coming back home I talked with the colonel of a regiment which was at the very front in the Meuse sector on the day when the armistice was signed. He was covered with medals—he did not show them, but he had them—every medal conceivable, a man who had made a most brilliant record in the war. He told me himself, "When we had orders to charge that morning I thought we were going to be slaughtered. Our runners were being captured as fast as we would send them out."
> I said, "Colonel, how about in the Argonne, when you were fighting down there? How about the use of poison gas if you had had it in quantities to help you?"

And let me say, Mr. President, they did have it in quantities. It is a cruel misrepresentation, from whatever source it comes, to say that the American Army was not protected with gas, as far as the use of it may be called protection; and I may say in passing that almost from the hour we entered into the war down to the time of its conclusion there never was any scarcity of gas as an American product. We had it in vast and constantly increasing quantities. Any shortage at the front was due to the scarcity of containers, shells, and so forth, not to the chemical department of the Government. It appears in this record, and is uncontroverted, that the chemical section of the Army was up to requirements at all times, and frequently beyond them. So the contention that because of the primitive character of our dye industry we were unable to equip ourselves with gas has no foundation whatever. Yet it is made throughout this record. It is accepted almost without question, in my judgment, simply because the representation is essential to the support of this bill, and also because much of it was unavailable for the reason which I have mentioned.

The professor continued:

> He said: "There is no question about it; if we had had the gas when we were trying to break up those machine-gun nests in the Argonne, there is many a boy from my regiment sleeping there now who would be on his way back home."
>
> I had a more impressive talk still with a very distinguished Britisher, Lord Moulton, in Paris, following one of our conferences about these peace-treaty dyes. Lord Moulton is the head of British Dyes (Ltd.)—a very distinguished man, a very thoughtful man. We were discussing the dye industry in England and in America. It was late in the afternoon. As we came down the steps after that meeting he stopped on the steps and said—

Listen to this—

> "Doctor, the future peace of this world is more closely tied up in the maintenance of the dye industries in England and in America than in any other measure that is now before the world."

Here we have it from this new convert to the doctrine of protection. The whole question involves the peace of the world, and unless this embargo is placed upon the exports from Germany, which can not come, unless this duty is magnified beyond what was declared to be necessary in 1916, the hideous specter of war will again stalk forth upon all the continents of the earth, and the angel of peace, scarcely returned, will take her departure, perhaps this time forevermore. But let us continue:

> There is a peculiar thing about the peace treaty in this section.

That was greeted with laughter. The professor said:

> Mr. Chairman, I did not mean to provoke any laughter, because this is a very serious question. Through this peace treaty Germany's hands are tied as far as the usual methods of making war are concerned—battleships, aircraft, submarines, forts—but I want to call your attention to the fact—I have already written about it in my own editorials—that her means for making poison gases are not touched in the slightest. All her plants for that purpose are untouched.
>
> Senator NUGENT. Merely because those plants are connected with or used in connection with their dye industry?
>
> Dr. HERTY. In making the commercial articles; yes, sir.
>
> Senator CALDER. They were overlooked?
>
> Dr. HERTY. I do not know, Senator; but it is a fact.

Now, mark this:

> Senator NUGENT. In other words, in order to place the Germans in such a position that they would be unable to manufacture poison gases in the future it would be necessary to destroy and dismantle those dyestuff manufacturing establishments? Is that what you mean?
>
> Dr. HERTY. I think that should have been done.
>
> Senator NUGENT. That is a fact, is it not?
> Dr. HERTY. It is a fact; yes. I think they should have been dismantled to the extent of allowing Germany to take care only of her own domestic needs for dyes; or, if necessary, to tie her hands even in that respect.

Now, Mr. President, if that is true, I submit the query, What possible rate of duty, what character of embargo, can protect us, if that protection is incomplete without the dismantling and destruction of the competitive manufactories existing on the Rhine and in other parts of Germany? What sort of peace should have been dictated to meet this condition? Should it have stopped at the dismantling and the destruction of the German dye factories? Would not the reasons requiring that arbitrary and brutal course be equally applicable to all other manufactories in Germany, many of which were quite as potent as accessories of war as the dye manufactories were? Shall we then confess to the world that American enterprise and American genius, American chemistry, American powers of combination and of competition are so inert and so helpless that the demolition of an adversary's means of production is the essential to her successful conduct of business and production?

I know of no more brutal sentiment to be found in postwar literature than the extremes advocated by a very peaceful gentleman, a very learned gentleman, a very good citizen, suddenly gone mad in his intense advocacy of a measure which in his heart of hearts, but for his hysteria, he would recognize as unjust, indefensible, and un-American.

Dr. Herty calls attention, on page 194, to another situation which he thinks should be considered as of importance and bearing upon this subject. He was asked by his counsel whether he had any information on the subject of the remission of taxes to German chemical firms at the present time, and his reply was:

Dr. HERTY. I think I have an item here about that. Here is an extract from the letter of the managing director of dye and organic work in a factory in Germany, dated August, 1919. I might say in this connection that I have here also an affidavit as to the correctness of this. Unless the committee insists upon it I will not submit the affidavit, as the gentleman requests here that his name be not used in connection with it. I will submit it to the members of the committee, of course, but I do not care to have a record made of it, as he may suffer in his business. In that letter he says:

"Another detail to which I would like to turn your attention is that they"—

Referring to the dye plants—

"have to pay no direct Government taxes. According to an understanding with the present Government, all organic chemical productions, the companies themselves as well as all dependencies, without exception, for the next 10 years, are freed from all direct State tax. In so far as community taxes come into consideration, I believe we will obtain a remission for our profession."

It seems they are exempt.

Senator CALDER. Would that mean to you all income and property taxes of every character?

Dr. HERTY. I do not know as to that.

If it be true that the German dye manufacturers are exempt from a direct tax, they are the most fortunate Germans in the world at this time. If it be true that they are not required to bear their portion of the public burdens, then it may well be said that that fact should be taken into consideration in determining the rate of duty to be imposed for the correspondent protection of the American manufacturer.

But let me say in the first place that this is testimony twice removed. Dr. Herty reads from an affidavit which some one has furnished him, but he declines to submit the name of the affiant, who has requested that his name be not disclosed. Now, why not? If it be a fact, it is a public fact. If it be a fact, it is one which any person having an interest in knowing of it can secure. Hence I can not conceive of the motive lying behind such a request, except it be that it is a part of the propaganda created in support of the bill. I am unable to credit it.

Germany has been through the greatest war of history. Her expenditures have been appalling. She has been obliged not only to levy tax after tax, to impose burden after burden, but also to issue bonds to the extent of tens of billions and to inflate her currency 500 or 600 per cent. To contend, therefore, that a favored industry has been exempt from taxation seems to me to contend the impossible. Not only so, but in my judgment the statement, even though true up to the time of the signing of the treaty, can not be true since then.

I wish to call attention to article 241 of the treaty in connection with this branch of my discussion. It is very short and reads as follows:

Germany undertakes to pass, issue, and maintain in force any legislation, orders, and decrees that may be necessary to give complete effect to these provisions.

"These provisions" are part 8 of the treaty and the annexes connected therewith entitled "reparation." In Annex II (b) of the treaty it is provided that—

In periodically estimating Germany's capacity to pay the commission shall examine the German system of taxation: First, to the end that the sums for reparation which Germany is required to pay shall become a charge upon all her revenues prior to that for the service or discharge of any domestic loan; and, secondly, so as to satisfy itself that in general the German scheme of taxation is fully as heavy proportionately as that of any of the powers represented on the commission.

Will any man in the face of these two drastic requirements pretend to say that the reparations commission, numbering among its members a representative of France trying to establish a dye industry of its own, and a representative of England trying to establish a dye industry of its own, will for a single moment tolerate the exemption of the German dye manufacturers from the taxes essential for the carrying on of the German Government, to say nothing of the payment of these indemnities? Why, Mr. President, the proposition is too plain to justify the occupation of any further time in the discussion of it. It is on a par with practically all of the arguments and the assertions that have been advanced in behalf of the measure, and in my judgment has been resorted to because of the need of mobilizing every apprehension, every rumor, and every possible assertion in support of the monstrous requirements of this measure.

Let me refer once more to Dr. Herty, but before doing so I should perhaps state that a report was made some time before Dr. Herty's visit to Germany by Mr. Keene, who, I think, upon the occasion of his visit to Europe, acted for the manufacturing chemists of New York, that there was a shortage of supply of German dyes.
